EUROPE.

The Conspiracy in France and Plot Against the Emperor's Life—Numerous Arrests of Suspected Parties.

PARIS, Feb. 12.—Thirty-five persons were arrested yesterday on suspicion of complicity in a plot against the State and the life of the Emperor. In all cases arms were found upon the persons of the prisoners. Those arrested were incarcerated in the Prison Mazas, all secret, on the Boulevard Mazas, and will soon be proceeded against. More arrests are to be made.

7 P. M.—There have been still further arrests by the Police to-day of persons engaged in the recent plot against the life of the Emperor.

10 P. M.—Several arrests have been made this evening. In all cases arms were found on the persons of the prisoners.

LONDON, Feb. 12.—The proof which the Paris officials pretend to have of a deep-laid plot against the Emperor's life are totally discredited here.

Further Arrest of Editors for Violations of the Press Law—The Reported Appointment of a Minister to Washington.

PARIS, Feb. 12.—The city is tranquil.... Seven of the editors of the Réforme (newspaper) have received an order to appear before the Court to answer charges preferred against them for violation of the Press law. In answer to this summons the Réforme this morning publishes an article against the Government of extraordinary violence.... The Paris Pays of to-day explains how the rumor arose that M. PARADOL was announced as having been appointed Envoy to Washington. He intends to go to America in the same way that Mr. DICKENS went, as a public reader, and will visit Washington during his stay in that country.

The Carlist Rising in Spain—Speech of Bismarck on Closing the Prussian Diet—Dethronement of the King of Bavaria—The Suez Canal.

MADRID, Feb. 12.—In the Cortes to-day, Senor RIVERO, in reply to a question, said the Government was fully aware of the conspiracy of the Carlists. The Government knew of their introduction of arms, giving out of money and appointment of officers. The Government would do nothing until the outbreak actually occurred, being abundantly able to crush it at once.

CADIZ, Feb. 12.—The Joseph Clark (not the Nicholas, as before reported,) went ashore recently at Cadiz. She is now discharging at San Lucar.

BERLIN, Feb. 12.—Count VON BISMARCK closed the Seasions of the Prussian Diet to-day with a speech. He regretted the spirit of opposition that had been shown in the Upper Chamber, and promised an extraordinary session soon. He made no reference to foreign affairs.

MUNICH, Feb. 12.—The Council is considering the subject of the dethronement of the King.

ALEXANDRIA, Feb. 12.—The great rock near Ismalia has been successfully moved from the bed of the Suez Canal. The minimum depth of water is now about twenty-nine feet.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Feb. 12.—The Servians and Montenegrins are intriguing, which causes considerable solicitude here.

Reported Agrarian Outrages in Ireland—The Case of Mr. Temple Again—Great Billiard Match—The Champion Defeated—Extreme Cold Weather.

LONDON, Feb. 12.—The agrarian outrages in Ireland continue. Dispatches received to-night state that a landlord in Kerry County was fired at to-day through a window while sitting in his parlor. Luckily the shot did not take effect. No arrest was made.... The Pall Mall Gazette this evening is severe upon the insincerity of Rev. Mr. TEMPLE'S disclaimer.... A splendid game of billiards was played last evening at St. James' Hall, Regent-street, between JOHN ROBERTS, the English champion, and W. COOK, Jr.; 1,200 points up, even, for the champion's gold cup and $200 a side, the "spot stroke" barred. Only five hundred tickets were issued, but there were twelve hundred people present, including a large number of the nobility, whereof the Prince of WALES and suite were most conspicuous. At 8 o'clock, Mr. COOK came forward, announced the conditions of the game, and proceeded to play. At first it was evident he was not in good playing condition, and the odds at the betting were against him. He warmed with his work, however, and at last won splendidly by 117 points amid the applause of the spectators.... The weather to-day is intensely cold throughout Europe. At Paris the thermometer indicates 30° Fahrenheit below the freezing point. The Elbe is entirely closed to navigation on account of the ice, and the practice of the Oxford and Cambridge boat crews on the Thames is suspended from the same cause.

VALENTIA, Ireland, Feb. 12.—Owing to a snowstorm, the lines to the eastward are working slowly and with difficulty this morning.

Cuba—Arrest of an Assassin in Havana—San Miguel Occupied by the Spaniards—Miscellaneous.

HAVANA, Feb. 12.—The assassin of ISAAC GREENWALDTH was arrested in this city last night. He is a native of the Canary Islands, and a Sergeant in the Fifth Battalion of Volunteers. A Court Martial will be immediately convened for the trial of the murderer.... Dispatches from San Miguel have been received. The troops now occupy that city, and many families from the insurrectionary districts had arrived and were settling in the town. The city is now perfectly quiet. No disturbance has occurred since Sunday last.... Telegraphic communication between Trinidad and Havana has been reëstablished, and the line is again open for business.

The Pacific Coast—A Flag for the National Capital Made of Native Silk—Veto by the Governor—Business and Mining Stocks.

SAN FRANCISCO, Cal., Feb. 12.—A flag for the National Capital, manufactured entirely of California silk, has been completed and will soon be forwarded to Washington.... The Governor has vetoed the bill passed by the Legislature awarding damages to HALL and GARRISON, the publishers of a secession paper in Visalia, which was destroyed by a mob consisting of soldiers and citizens.... There is a perfect stagnation of business in all departments in this city. .... It is raining in the southern part of the State. .... Mining stocks during the week were weak. The following are the closing quotations: Alpha, $11; Belcher, $18; Bullion, $7; Empire Mill, $20; Gould & Curry, $54; Hale & Norcross, $142; Imperial, $28; Kentuck, $90; Occidental, $12; Ophir, $12; Overman, $63; Savage, $35; Sierra Nevada, $8; Yellow Jacket, $52.

RED RIVER AFFAIRS.

Proceedings of the Winnepeg Convention—A Bill of Rights to be Submitted to the Dominion Government.

CHICAGO, Ill., Feb. 12.—The Winnepeg New Nation, of Jan. 28, gives the proceedings of the convention of English and French delegates which assembled on the 25th, at Upper Fort Garry, to consider the overtures of Mr. GOULD SMITH, the Canadian Commissioner. Nothing was done on the first day, the delegates not having all arrived. On the third day the Convention was ready for business. Sealed papers were opened when it was found that Canada was disposed to do justice to the Red River men; also, that communication with the Home Government being difficult, Mr. SMITH was to act in accordance with his own private judgment. Mr. SMITH being admitted to a hearing, confirmed the impression that the Canadian Government was disposed to grant them all the privileges accorded to any of its citizens. Mr. REILLE, in a warm speech, acknowledged his allegiance to the Queen, denying that he was a Canadian subject. He asked Mr. SMITH to explicitly state whether he was ready to grant what was asked in the bill of rights of December. Mr. SMITH replied that he could not state from memory its provisions, and asked to look at it and consider the matter. A new bill of rights was suggested, and, on motion of Mr. REILLE, a committee, consisting of three English and three French, were appointed to meet on the 28th of January, and draw up a bill of rights in accordance with the wishes of the people. Mr. REILLE was chosen one of the Committee. He was evidently the master spirit of the Convention. Private advices state that if any changes are made in the bill, they will be on the side of stronger guarantees for the rights of the people.

OTTAWA, Ontario, Feb. 12.—Bishop TACHE, of Red River, is still here. He has been present at the sitting of the Cabinet in order to be consulted on Red River affairs. He expects to leave for Fort Garry on Wednesday next.

STATE LEGISLATURES.

Political Disabilities in Virginia—Adjournment in Colorado—Bills Passed During the Session Woman-Suffrage Granted in Utah.

RICHMOND, Va., Feb. 12.—The House today adopted, with but few dissenting votes, a resolution declaring that it is not expedient to elect any person to any office who is disqualified by the Fourteenth Amendment. This resolution is in answer to a suggestion contained in the Governor's Message that, if in view of a scarcity of competent persons the Legislature should elect some who are disqualified, it should accompany the election with a resolution asking Congress to remove their disabilities.

DENVER, Col., Feb. 12.—The Colorado Legislature adjourned last night. The following bills were passed: Granting a reward of $2,000 for the first artesian well sunk one thousand feet, or a less sum if flowing well at a less depth, the well to be not less than three inches bore; a bill for the organization of a Territorial common school system, and providing for a Superintendent of the same. The law prohibiting the introduction of Texas cattle was repealed. The Woman Suffrage bill failed to pass. The Governor appointed, and the Council confirmed, a full set of Territorial officers, all Republicans except the Territorial Assayer.

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 12.—A bill was introduced in the State Senate to-day requiring the municipal election to be held on the second Monday in November, thus either prolonging the term of the present incumbents or allowing the Government to appoint.

SALT LAKE, Feb. 12.—The bill lately introduced in the Mormon Legislature, granting the right of suffrage to the women of Utah, passed both Houses and the Council, and has just been signed by Acting Governor MANN.

THE WEST.

The Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce on the National Finances—Trials in Chicago—Hard Times in Iowa.

CINCINNATI, Ohio, Feb. 12.—The Chamber of Commerce of this city to-day unanimously adopted resolutions declaring

That the financial condition of the country requires such a supervision of the tariff by the present Congress as will yield the largest revenue in the least burdensome manner to the manufacturing interests requiring it. That a tariff to foster monopolies and give special advantages to a comparatively small number of persons, is oppressive and unjust to the great body of the people, and will not be tolerated by any political party when the people are enlightened as to its operations. That the Tariff bill lately presented by the Committee of Ways and Means is not such as is demanded in the present depressed condition of trade and manufactures; that it renews and even aggravates the odious discriminating characteristics of existing laws by which large advantages are given to some departments, creating enormous wealth for a few at the expense of the many, which is unjustly taken from the pockets of the many, under the pretence of protecting labor, but which, in fact, robs labor of its fair returns by destroying other industries and forcing labor into competition with itself. That all raw material and articles entering into the provinces of labor should be admitted free of duty or at the lowest possible rates consistent with the established industries and with the financial condition of the country.

The resolutions provide for sending a copy to the Ohio Senators and Representatives in Congress.... The religious interest is maintained in the churches of this city. Information has been received from many adjacent cities and towns, which show that the revival is becoming general.

CHICAGO, Ill., Feb. 12.—The men who participated in the riot on board the steamer Dubuque, last Summer, on the Mississippi River, between Rock Island and Clinton, by which five or six colored men were killed, are on trial at Rock Island.... The breach of promise case taken from the Superior Court of this city to the Circuit Court of Lake County, and which was brought by the notorious SAMANTHA PROCTOR, alias Mme. Cora James, against IRA Y. MANN, one of the wealthiest and most prominent citizens of Chicago, and which has been on trial for several weeks past at Waukegan, has resulted in a verdict for the defendant.... The following military dispatch was received at Lieutenant-General SHERIDAN'S headquarters to-day: "General SCHOFIELD, commanding the Department of the Missouri, has ordered three companies of cavalry from Forts Hooker and Hayes to protect the frontier settlements.... An Iowa gentleman now here says that the farmers in that State are compelled to pay twenty per cent. for money to meet their obligations. The pressure of hard times is very severe on them.

THE INDIANS.

Renewed Hostilities on the Frontier—A Letter From General Harney, of Kansas, Asking for more Troops.

CHICAGO, Ill., Feb. 12.—A letter from General HARNEY to General SCHOFIELD, dated Feb. 8, says:

Bands of hostile Indians are again roaming off a little to the west of our frontier settlements, which are now at the mercy of the miscreants. Will you please send some troops to the frontier, and urge upon the President the adoption of the Indian policy we talked of last Summer, namely: "Of forcing them to dismount and disarm upon their reservations, and holding them there by military power. No other plan will give security to citizens or civilization to the Indians, and the sooner it is adopted the better for all concerned."

A letter from Camp Supple states that the Kiowas had gone [illegible], but Gill to receive their annuities, and that they and the Comanches had concluded not to go to war at present.

CANADA.

Discount Rate for American Silver Established by the Dominion Government—Transfer of Government Buildings in Fredrickton, N. B.

OTTAWA, Feb. 12.—A proclamation appears in to-day's official Gazette, declaring that on and after the 15th of April next American silver shall pass current at rates determined by the Government as follows: Fifty cent pieces at forty cents, twenty-five cent pieces at twenty cents, ten cent pieces at eight cents, five cent pieces at four cents. Discount on American invoice for the ensuing week, seventeen per cent.... The Government has transferred the properties in Fredrickton, N. B., known as the Government House and Provisional Buildings, for the use of the Government and Legislature of New-Brunswick.

Election in Montreal—The Funeral of the Late General Wyndham.

MONTREAL, Ont., Feb. 12.—THOMAS WORKMAN was reëlected Mayor of Montreal to-day.... The funeral of General WYNDHAM, late commander of the forces in Canada, took place this afternoon. All the troops in garrison, the militia officers and the prominent citizens were present. The public offices were closed at noon as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased.

Destructive Fires in Illinois and Connecticut—Heavy Losses.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Feb. 12.—SPRING'S hotel, store and harness shop at Cobden, Ill., were burned on Thursday night. The loss is $30,000, and insurance $12,000.

HARTFORD, Conn., Feb. 12.—An incendiary fire took place in Stafford last night, at 10:30 o'clock, which in half an hour consumed the entire works of the Stafford Loom Works, involving a loss of $20,000. The insurance is $10,000. JOHNSON & WEEDEN, spool cotton manufacturers, in the same building, lost $14,000. They were insured for $8,000. C. J. HOLMES, manufacturer of patent meat cutters, lost $150. CONVERSE & CLEVELAND, grist mill, lost $150.

A Bold Robbery in Boston—The Thief Captured—Reduction of the Massachusetts State Constabulary.

BOSTON, Feb. 12.—About noon to-day a young clerk employed by MANNING, HOWLAND & Co. was knocked down, choked and robbed of $2,700 in the entry of the First National Bank on State street. An alarm was promptly given and the robber knocked down and captured by a teamster, and all the money recovered. The robber gave the name of JOHN REED.... In accordance with a legislative edict, and in pursance of General Order No. 2, issued by the State Constable of the Commonwealth, the force of State Police was reduced this morning to sixty-three men for the entire State—the previous number having been 150.

Miscellaneous Telegrams.

NEW-ORLEANS, La., Feb. 12.—Two of the alleged consolidated bank robbers have been arrested. The Picayune says that special officers were the ringleaders in the robbery.... WILBER, Jr., of the firm of WILBER & Co., is reported absconded with $100,000.

BOSTON, Feb. 12.—In the Municipal Court to-day DENNIS HANFORD was arraigned for the wilful murder of JAS. O'CONNELL, in Lynch-alley, on Monday night. He will be examined on Friday next.... In the United States Circuit Court, in the case of CALVIN A. HILL, charged with attempting to pass a counterfeit $1,000 Treasury note, the jury were unable to agree.

ST. JOHN, N. B., Feb. 12.—The Ministry of Newfoundland has resigned, and CHARLES FOX BENNETT has been called upon to form a new Government.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Feb. 12.—Old ice men now pronounce the ice crop of this season a total failure. The Washington and Knickerbocker Ice Companies, together, have commenced stocking ice at Whitehall one foot thick.

The Case of Von Saun & Co.—The Report of the Gold Board Committee—The Matter Given Over to the Courts.

A special meeting of the Gold Board was held yesterday afternoon to hear the report of the Committee of three appointed on Thursday last to investigate the charges against Messrs. VAN SAUN & CO. Mr. H. S. CAMBLOSS, Chairman of the Committee, read the report, which was to the effect that every facility had been afforded for an examination of the books of the firm, and the Committee had concluded that it was unnecessary to pursue the investigation further, believing that justice could be done to all parties only through the Courts. The Committee had recommended to Messrs. VAN SAUN & Co. that they withdraw from the Board until the case has been finally settled, and they now recommend that members of the Board refrain from expressing any opinion in the matter until a full settlement has been reached. Mr. CAMBLOSS stated that he had read the report to Messrs. VAN SAUN & Co., as he deemed it no more than right that they should know its contents.

It was then moved by Mr. BURNS that the report be accepted and the Committee discharged, but before the motion was put, Mr. KEPPLER suggested that although the Committee had recommended that Messrs. VAN SAUN & Co. refrain from doing business in the Board until the matter had been settled, there was no assurance that they would comply with the recommendation, and therefore proposed that some action be taken to relieve the Board of all responsibility in respect to their future action. The President thought any such action unnecessary and declined to entertain any motion on the subject. The report of the Committee was then accepted and the meeting adjourned.

A Chapter of Burglaries in Brooklyn.

Burglars, yesterday morning, entered the house of WM. H. JONES, Quincy-street, near Franklin-avenue, and carried away clothing and silverware to the value of $282.

Another set broke into the house of CHARLES BUTTRICK, Bergen-street, near Franklin-avenue, and stole $178 worth of jewelry and silverware.

Another band entered the house of ISAAC MCNULTY, No. 22 Sands-street, and took off with them $100 worth of cutlery and silverware.

Another crowd broke open the shutter of the front basement window of Mr. MORTIMER'S house, No. 63 Nassau-street, and contented themselves with $17 worth of cutlery, &c.

A sneak thief, on Friday evening, entered the hallway of Mr. C. H. HANCOCK'S house, No. 268 Hall-street, and took away $75 worth of coats.

In none of the cases mentioned, all occurring within eighteen hours, were arrests made.

Labor Movements.

A meeting of the umbrella and parasol makers was held last evening at No. 193 Bowery, when they regularly organized by electing Miss LEONARD President of their new protective Union. They have succeeded in their strike and will receive their former wages from the manufacturers.

The operative plasterers held a meeting last night at Demilt Hall, and the majority of those present declared in favor of maintaining the rule in regard to working only eight hours a day.

Personal.

Aaron Alrensleben, Secretary of the Prussian Legation is at the Albemarle Hotel. Hons. Samuel L. Nickerson, E. D. L. Sweet and P. L. Underwood, of Chicago, and Dr. J. J. Mott, of North Carolina, are at the St. Nicholas Hotel. Hon. E. C. Banfield, of Washington, Hon. C. H. Parkhurst, of Providence, Hon. J. N. Ford, of Buffalo, and Captain Hancock, of Savannah, are at the Fifth-avenue Hotel. General J. C. Robinson, of the United States Army, is at the St. Denis Hotel. Commander Sprague, of the United States Navy, is at the Irving House. General A. R. Root, of Buffalo, is at the St. James' Hotel.

Probable Loss of an American Ship with All on Board.

From the Boston Traveller, Feb. 11.

A ship, supposed the Santee, of Portsmouth, N. H., Captain MAGRAM, from Guanape with guano, Aug. 12, for Liverpool, struck off Skibbereen, south coast of Ireland, recently, and all hands are supposed to have perished. A stove, marked "Jos. SARGENT, Boston, No. 4," had been washed ashore from her. Mr. SARGENT, by referring to his books, found that it had been furnished to her, therefore her loss is considered but too likely to prove true. She was a fine vessel of 1,078 tons, built of New-Hampshire white oak in 1869, rated A 1, and was owned by Messrs. T. M. & T. B. TREDICK. She probably had a crew of twenty-eight all told. Her cargo was insured in England, but the vessel herself and the freight are insured here and in New-York.

WASHINGTON.

The Line and Staff Question in the Navy—Important Letter from Admiral Farragut—The Case of Georgia—Close of the Gold Plot Investigation—The House Proceedings.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12.—The following letter from Admiral FARRAGUT to Secretary ROBESON, on the line and staff question in the navy, has been sent to the House Naval Committee, and will be submitted to Congress on Monday. Secretary ROBESON addressed a letter to the Admiral asking his views on the House bill No. 976, and this, as the Admiral observes, is the reason why he enters into the discussion of this embarrassing question:

NEW-YORK, Feb. 11, 1870.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 7th inst., and agreeably to your request, I have read with great care the several sections of the bill, and I am happy to say that so far as its general features are concerned, it meets, with but few exceptions, with my cordial concurrence. To demonstrate more clearly the few points upon which I have differed slightly with the honorable Secretary, I beg leave to submit herewith my opinion in detail. I regret that the honorable Secretary should have discarded the original idea of a Board of Survey, which, in my opinion, should be designated "the Board of Admiralty," and be confined entirely to that grade, with the exception, of course, of the Secretary. I do not wish to be understood as objecting to the name of "survey," but simply that I consider that of "admiralty" more appropriate. The Admiral of the Navy, holding by law the same relative position as Chief of the Army, should be President of this Naval Board; and in the event of his disability or absence, "the Vice-Admiral" should assume the duties of President of said Board; and in the absence of the Secretary of the Navy, the senior member of the Board should act as Secretary of the Navy pro tem. I may be accused of self-interest in suggesting the organization of such a Board, yet I am firm in my conviction that it would tend to the general good of the service.

In Section 3, I would respectfully suggest the insertion of the words, "or as often as may be deemed expedient by the Secretary of the Navy."

In reference to the reorganization of the Medical Corps, as provided for in section 7, I beg leave to state that I had always fixed in my own mind upon the necessity of appointing ten medical directors, with the assimilated rank of Captain, to be placed in charge of hospitals and asylums. But, as I have always stated, I consider that the simple question of number should be decided by the Government, as it is supposed to know the requirements of the service. The same observation will apply, with equal force, to the reorganization of the Engineer Corps, wherein I have always considered that there should be twenty engineers of the first class, with the assimilated rank of Commander, instead of ten, as specified in the section referred to. I am opposed to section 17 from the fact that, in my opinion, no officer below the grade of Commodore should fill the office of Chief of Bureau of the Navy Department. But so long as officers below that grade are appointed to such positions, I coincide entirely with the honorable Secretary that the rank, pay and allowances should for the time be equal to that of a Commodore of the line on sea duty. In reference to section 19, specifying the position of executive office, I beg leave to observe to the honorable Secretary that I have never entertained the least doubts as to their right to take precedence over all officers attached to vessels, yards, stations or establishments, whilst in the discharge of their duty as connected with such vessel, yard, station or establishment. This is, after all, but temporary authority, and in terminating such duty; and if any one feels himself wronged, he has the same right of appeal to the commanding officer. But as executive officers are the organs of communication between the commander and their command, and are responsible for the good condition of their vessels, and, in fact, for everything in the absence of their superior officers, the discipline of the service requires that they should have entire control in the manner specified in the clause referred to. In such positions, as in many others, it is not the simple exercise of authority which often creates ill feelings, but the abuse of it. With the above few points of difference I beg leave to repeat that the bill of the honorable Secretary meets with my entire concurrence, and appears to be one which will be acceptable to all who desire the speedy restoration of harmony to the service. In the beginning of this contest I felt desirous to do justice to the merits of such staff officers as had served in my command, and up to this time I have equally expressed to the dangers of the profession, and hence when Surgeon PALMER appealed to me to know if I had any objection to a certain bill which provided for a higher grade for the older officers, I readily answered in the negative, saying that I thought that older officers of the staff corps who had served the country faithfully, sharing all the privations of war equally with the line, had a natural right to expect promotion to a higher grade in their respective corps. At that time I did not deem it possible that the feeling could become so violent; and, whilst my opinion, then circulated, simply advocated a reward for merit, at the same time placing such officers at shore stations, as to prevent contact with officers of the line of the same grade. I am glad to find that all the Boards and the honorable Secretary are now as ready to accord to them this preferment as myself. During all this time I have been prepared to express my opinion without prejudice or partiality, but have studiously avoided doing so until such time as it was called for by authority.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. G. FARRAGUT,
Admiral United States Navy.

To Hon. GEORGE M. ROBESON, Secretary of the Navy.

THE CASE OF GEORGIA.

The Judiciary Committee of the Senate had a long session to-day, and were occupied exclusively with the case of Georgia. Representatives of the rival factions were heard, Mr. GIBSON for the Bullock party, and Mr. CALDWELL on the other side. It is difficult to foreshadow what the Committee will decide on reporting. The anti-Bullock men think that the present Senators elect will be admitted, and the legislation so far held valid. But that is exactly what they want.

THE GOLD INVESTIGATION.

The investigation of the New-York gold-gambling speculators was closed to-day by the Committee of Banking and Currency, and it was decided to examine no more witnesses unless some new revelations or suspicions called for inquiry. The testimony taken will, if printed, make a volume of several hundred pages; but it is doubtful whether such action will ever be taken. The next duty of the Committee will be to prepare their report, which has not yet been commenced.

IN THE HOUSE.

Only one branch of Congress, the House, was in session to-day, and the proceedings there were very unprofitable and barren of results. The Appropriation bill claimed the attention of the body, and the public printing was the principal bone of contention. An unsuccessful effort was made in Committee of the Whole to cut down the Department printing and binding, and a very foolish proposition of Mr. WOOD in reference to the Congressional library was promptly negatived. Mr. HALDEMAN to-day alluded in the House to the action of the Senate in rejecting the House Census bill, and observed that the taking of the census under the old law would result in utter failure and disgrace.

Dispatch to the Associated Press.

TREASURY STATEMENT.

The Treasury statement, showing the receipts and expenditures by warrants for the quarter ending Dec. 31, 1869, was issued to-day. The following exhibit is made:

Receipts.

Revenues	$79,393,523 51
Miscellaneous sources	11,020,331 06
Loans and Treasury notes	23,975,820 22
Repayments	1,984,360 98
Total	$116,374,291 37

Total	$236,389,149 23

Expenditures.

Civil and miscellaneous	$11,445,908 50
War, Navy, Interior and Indians, and pensions	25,290,965 45
Interest on public debt	25,485,310 84
Purchase of United States bonds	40,271,015 28
Redemption of the public debt	5,442,712 00
Total	$107,925,912 07
Balance in the Treasury, Dec. 31, 1869	$128,463,237 16

The balance in the Treasury Sept. 30, 1869, by this statement is $4,651,194 93 in excess of the balance as published in the debt statement of Oct. 1, 1869, and the balance in the Treasury Department Dec. 1, 1869, by this statement is $6,529,-798 16 in excess of the balance as published in the debt statement of Jan. 1, 1870. These differences are accounted for by the fact that the expenditures are all known and included in the monthly debt statement, while the receipts being taken from the returns in the office at the close of business on the last day of each month, do not include the entire receipts for the quarter.

FRACTIONAL CURRENCY STATEMENT.

THE NATIONAL FINANCES.

Reduction of the Debt—Economy and Reduced Taxation—Letters from Senator Cragin and Secretary Boutwell.

From the Manchester (N. H.) Mirror, Feb. 11.

SENATE CHAMBER,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 7, 1870.

DEAR SIR: I received yours of the 1st inst., and also the inclosure, being a brief article from some Democratic paper, charging that the claim, on the part of the Republicans, that the public debt had been largely reduced by the present Administration, was a humbug and a fraud,—that the reduction was produced by excluding the Pacific Railroad bonds from the former Administration were included as a part of the debt. I knew that those statements were false. I knew there had been an actual reduction of the real debt of over $80,000,000 since the 1st day of March last; but in order to set the matter at rest, even among the men who, by their opposition to the Government during this time, have increase the debt, I wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury, and I now forward you his reply for publication.

The Pacific Railroad bonds are not an actual debt of the Government, but only a liability, which may or may not become a part of the public debt. The Government loaned these railroads its bonds, which the roads have agreed to pay at maturity. The Government has not advanced or received a dollar on the principal of these bonds—it is simply surety for their payment. As yet they are no debt of the Government.

You may be sure that Congress is in earnest in its efforts to reduce the expenditures of the Government to the lowest practicable point. Economy is the watchword and policy of the Administration, and of a large majority of the members of both Houses, and there will be no let up or variation from that policy. No useless or improper appropriation will be made, and those which are necessary will be as low as the exigencies of the service will admit of. We shall reduce the taxes on many things, and favor the interests of labor. We shall reduce or abolish the duties on tea and coffee and other necessaries, and hold fast to duties upon foreign productions which come in competition with American industry. British free trade and cheap labor are identical. Free admission to this country of the productions of foreign labor—productions which should be fostered and encouraged here—means low wages for American laborers and mechanics.

An earnest, and I believe successful, effort will be made to fund the public debt on a much lower rate of interest, thereby saving an annual expense of from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000. This will be an annual reduction of taxes to that amount.

The franking privilege will be abolished, though I hope the present bill may be amended so as to allow newspapers to circulate free in the counties where published, as heretofore.

I trust the men in New-Hampshire, who stood by the flag in the dark hours of the war, will adhere to the principles of the party which saved the nation and now proposes to conduct its affairs so as to preserve its faith and honor untarnished and to insure liberty, equal rights, moral, intellectual and social elevation and material prosperity to all the people. Yours truly,

A. H. CRAGIN.

SPECIAL STATEMENT OF SECRETARY BOUTWELL.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Feb. 7, 1870.

SIR: I reply briefly to your letter of the 4th inst. in reference to the amount of public debt on the 1st of March, 1869, as compared with the amount on the 1st of February, 1870.

The net amount of the public debt on the 1st of March, 1869, including interest accrued and not paid, and excluding Pacific Railroad bonds, was $2,525,463,260 01. The principal of the bonds then issued to the Pacific Railroad Companies was $63,937,000, or an aggregate liability and indebtedness of $2,589,400,260 01.

On the 1st of February, 1870, the net amount of the debt, excluding bonds issued to the Pacific Railroad Companies, and including interest accrued and not paid, was $2,444,813,288 92. The bonds issued to the Pacific Railroad Companies on the latter date amounted to $64,457,320, or an aggregate liability and indebtedness of $2,509,-270,608 92.

It thus appears that the liability of the United States on account of the Pacific Railroads has been increased during the eleven months, under acts of Congress previously passed, to the amount of $10,520,320.

During the same period of eleven months, the direct debt of the United States has been diminished $80,649,971 09; and if the increased liability of the United States on account of the Pacific Railroads be added, there still remains an actual diminution of the total public debt of the United States, direct and contingent, during these eleven months, of $70,129,651 09.

These statements are based upon the books of the Treasury Department, and cannot in any way be impeached.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, Secretary.

Hon. A. H. CRAGIN, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Greenbacks as Legal-Tender—Letter from Mr. Chase.

The Washington Chronicle publishes the following letter from Chief Justice CHASE, written while Secretary of the Treasury, in 1862, to the Committee of Ways and Means:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 29, 1862.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means, referring me to House bill No. 240, and requesting my opinion as to the propriety and necessity of its immediate passage by Congress. The condition of the Treasury certainly renders immediate action on the subject of affording provision for the expenditures of the Government, both expedient and necessary. The general provisions of the bill submitted seem to me to be well-adapted to the end proposed. There are, however, some points which may, perhaps, be usefully amended.

The provision making United States notes a legal tender, has doubtless been well considered by the committee, and their conclusions needs no support from any observation of mine. I think it my duty, however, to say that in respect to this provision my reflections have conducted me to the same conclusion they have reached. It is not unknown to them that I have felt, nor do I wish to conceal that I now feel, a great aversion to making anything but coin a legal tender in payment of debts.

It has been my anxious wish to avoid the necessity of such legislation. It is, however, at present, impossible, in consequence of the large expenditures entailed by the war and the suspension of the banks, to procure sufficient coin for disbursements; and it is therefore the opinion indispensably necessary that we should resort to the issue of United States notes. The making them a legal tender might, however, still be avoided if the willingness manifested by the people generally, by railroad companies and by many of the banking institutions to receive and pay them as money in all transactions, were absolutely or practically universal, but unfortunately there are some persons and some institutions which refuse to receive and pay them, and whose action tends, not merely to the unnecessary depreciation of the notes, but, to establish discriminations in business against those in this matter who give a cordial support to the Government, and in favor of those who do not. Such discrimination should, if possible, be prevented, and the provision making the notes a legal-tender, in a great measure, at least, prevents it by putting all citizens in this respect on the same level, both of rights and duties.

The Committee doubtless feel the necessity of accompanying this measure by legislation necessary to secure the highest credit as well as largest currency for these notes. This security can be found, in my judgment, by proper provision for funding them in interest-bearing bonds, by well-guarded legislation authorizing banking associations with circulation based on the bonds in which the notes are funded, and by a judicious system of adequate taxation which will not only create a demand for the notes, but, by securing the prompt payment of interest, raise and sustain the credit of the bonds. Such legislation, it may be hoped, will divest the legal-tender clause of the bill of injurious tendencies, and secure the earliest possible return to a sound currency of coin and promptly convertible notes. I beg leave to add that vigorous military operations and the unsparing retrenchment of all necessary expenses will also contribute essentially to this desirable end. * * *

I have the honor to be, with very great respect, yours, truly, S. P. CHASE.

To Hon. THAD. STEVENS, Chairman.

EUROPEAN NEWS BY MAIL.

ARRIVAL OF THE JAVA AND WESTPHALIA.

The Java, from Liverpool Jan. 29, and Queenstown Jan. 30, and the Westphalia, from Hamburg Jan. 26 and Havre Jan. 29, both reached this port yesterday. The news thus received is later by two days than that at hand by the City of Washington, Friday night. For late continental papers we are once more indebted to the courtesy of Captain SCHWENSEN, of the Westphalia.

Lord GRANVILLE, in acknowledging the receipt of a copy of a letter addressed by the Emigrant and Colonists' Aid Corporation to the various Colonial Governors, writes that the only colonies to which it is likely that the corporation can send emigrants are Canada, the Cape, Natal, or Australia. In all these, except Natal and West Australia, the management of the Crown lands has been surrendered to the Colonial Governments. Except, therefore, in those two colonies, the Secretary of State could not interfere to procure the corporation grants of land, and in those two colonies there are special circumstances, arising from the wasteful manner in which land has heretofore been given away, which would make it very inexpedient to do so. Lord GRANVILLE does not see, therefore, that he can assist the corporation in that respect. Neither could he assist the corporation in obtaining guarantees of loans or in recovery of advances or grants in aid. Any such assistance, if it is to be obtained at all, must come from the local Legislatures; but (his Lordship adds) the history of the past renders it unlikely that Colonial Governments would adopt the responsibility of collecting such advances. With respect to forwarding emigrants to their destination, Lord GRANVILLE apprehends that there would be no difficulty in obtaining the cordial coöperation of the local Governments, especially if the expenses were defrayed from the funds of the corporation. His Lordship says that he has no doubt that whatever measures may be undertaken by the corporation towards setting on foot a healthy emigration will be beneficial both to the emigrants and the colonies, and, though he must decline on the part of her Majesty's Government to give exceptional advantages to the corporation, or to any other company, he will be ready to give the necessary facilities of the colonies to afford information on any specific points which persons interested in the colonies may desire.

On Tuesday night, Jan. 25, about 11 o'clock, a severe shock was felt at Cologne and several adjacent towns, caused by an explosion of dynamite which was stored in a manufactory at Dünwald, about seven miles from the city. The manufactory had only recently been finished, and the manufacture had but just commenced. The whole fabric has been destroyed, and fifteen workmen have been literally blown to pieces. Twenty-une persons, the widows and children of the deceased men, are left unprovided for by this calamity. The quantity of dynamite which exploded was only about two hundred weight, and, what is remarkable, a much larger quantity, deposited in the immediate neighborhood, remained intact.

A Madrid telegram gives the result of the recent elections in the north of Spain, as follows: 519,000 votes polled by the Monarchist Party, 149,000 by the Republicans, and 89,000 by the Carlists.

FRANCE

Diseases Common to the Empire—Special Maladies—Progress of Insanity.

A French paper gives interesting details of the principal diseases common in France, and affecting the inhabitants of certain parts of the country more particularly. The diseases most frequently observed in Paris are pulmonary phthisis, pneumonia, and typhus fever; nervous and brain diseases, measles, croup, smallpox, &c. The Spring is the unhealthiest season, and the months, as regards mortality, may be classed thus: March, April, February, January, December; May, June, July, August, November, September, October. Pulmonary phthisis, so common in Paris, is still more destructive in the department of the Rhone, and especially at Lyons. It attacks many females in the valleys of the Jura and the Hautes-Pyrenees, and is frequent in Corsica in spite of the southern position of the island. Scrofula abounds amongst the poorer classes at Bordeaux and the poor agriculturists of La Vendée, of Berry, and of Auvergne.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

THE DEATH OF PARIS.

O strange, O strange, when on his lips once more
Her lips were laid! O strange that he must die
Now, when so clear a vision had come o'er
His failing heart, and keenest memory
Had shown him all his changing life passed by:
And what he was, and what he might have been,
Yea, and should be, perchance, so clear were seen!

Yea, then were all things laid within the scale,
Pleasure and lust, love and desire of fame,
Kindness, and hope, and folly—all the tale
Told in a moment, as across him came
That sudden flash, bright as the lightning flame,
Showing the wanderer on the waste how he
Has gone astray 'mid dark and misery.

Ah, and her face upon his dying face
That the sun warmed no more! that agony
Of dying love, wild with the tale of days
Long past, and strange with hope that might not be—
All was gone now, and what least part had he
In Love at all, and why was life all gone?
Why must he meet the eyes of death alone?

Alone, for she and ruth had left him there;
Alone, because the ending of the strife
He knew, well taught by death, drew surely near.
Alone, for all those years with pleasures rife
Should be a tale 'mid Helen's coming life,
And she and all the world should go its ways,
'Midst other troubles, other happy days.

And yet how was it with him? As if death
Strove yet with struggling life and love in vain,
With eyes grown deadly bright and rattling breath,
He raised himself, while wide his blood did stain
The linen fair, and seized the horn again,
And blew thereon a wild and shattering blast,
Ere from his hand afar the thing he cast.

Then, as a man who in a failing fight
For a last onset gathers suddenly
All soul and strength, he faced the Summer light,
And from his lips broke forth a mighty cry
Of "Helen, Helen, Helen!"—yet the sky
Changed not above his cast-back golden head,
And merry was the world though he was dead.

THE RETURN TICKET.

"What station, Sir?"

"Great Western," I replied to cabbie through the trap door of the hansom.

The horse described a half circle, and away we rattled through the crowded streets of the metropolis. I looked at the whirling panorama of life with the curiosity and interest natural to a man who returns to his own country after an absence of ten years in the colonies.

"Any more going?" shouted the guard, in the tone of a last appeal.

"O yes, my sister and I and our luggage!" screamed a frantic old lady, with a dog under her arm, pushing resolutely into the carriage where I was sitting.

"Dog must go in the box, ma'am," said the inexorable guard, calling to an assistant to remove the half-strangled beast of a cur.

"What a brute!" said the old lady, referring to the railway official.

There are certain people who, if you meet them in a second-class carriage, take the earliest opportunity of intimating that their position in that class is exceptional, and that they are really first-class people. The two elderly sisters discoursed together with this object for the public benefit, and were satisfied that I at least understood them. They were inclined to patronize me, till they found that I talked with the fat farmer on the other side. He was a good kind of man, and I was glad to converse with both him and his intelligent companion, who appeared to be a tradesman. The remaining occupant of the compartment was a silent man in the corner, about whom I should not have troubled myself, had not his proceedings been somewhat eccentric. For at least two hours he did not address a single word to his fellow-travelers, but diligently read the newspaper. When he had exhausted the contents of the journal, he pulled a carpet bag from under the seat, unlocked it, and took from its recesses a small bottle carefully wrapped in a red silk handkerchief. The bottle, I should say, held about eight ounces of what was apparently clear water.

The silent man replaced the carpet bag, and then, leaning back in his seat, held the bottle horizontally before him, at the distance of six inches from his eyes.

If a man is reduced to read the advertisement sheet of the Times, is absorbed in the trashiest yellow-backed novel, or even proceeds to eat his sandwiches like a bear, you don't scrutinize his movements. But when a person, observed to be peculiarly taciturn in manner, continues for half an hour gazing fixedly through a bottle placed at a particular angle, and never moves a muscle of his face, you begin to speculate on his mental state—think, what next? and then remember the approaching Box tunnel.

The old ladies looked at the silent man with unfeigned astonishment, made dumb motions at each other, and got very uneasy.

I noticed that the man of the bottle had contracted a most sinister squint in the course of his singular act of investigation. Unable any longer to restrain my curiosity, I said, leaning towards him,

"Excuse me, Sir, but do you see anything remarkable in that bottle that you look at it so attentively?"

No answer came from the silent man, and every one looked up and cleared their throats. Every moment the squint became more frightful, and the mystery more incomprehensible.

"Do 'ee nudge him, Sir," said the farmer to me. "It misgives me he isn't i' his right mind, somehow."

"Sister," cried the elder of the two ladies, "what shall we do? I can't stand this any longer. There is no saying what he may do next."

"What 'ave you got in that eer bottle, Sir?" said the farmer, emboldened by increasing curiosity. "Us in our parts would consider it a bit queer to go glowering at a bottle in that fashion."

No answer. This was not to be endured; so I tapped the shoulder of the silent man, and repeated my question about the bottle in sufficiently loud tones.

"You have interrupted me most unfortunately," said the owner of the bottle. "There was something just coming over the field of vision, I really believe. Would you like to try?" and so saying, he handed me the mysterious bottle.

The two old ladies gave little faint cries of horror. I turned the phial round and round, feeling more than ever puzzled as to its use and purpose. Again I inquired about the mystery; the silent man begged me to speak louder, for he was very deaf. He then good-naturedly explained to me that the bottle contained mesmerised water, and added that it was given to him by a friend who was a great believer; who told him that if he would look at the bottle steadily for a certain time, keeping his mind entirely abstracted, that he would be able to see past events which had occurred to himself and others.

"Do you believe in it?"

"Not exactly; but just as you spoke there was a sort of mist before my eyes; perhaps the picture would have come out."

The subject of spiritualism and second sight once started, every one had a story to tell. Even the fat farmer had known a "Thornaby waisate" in his own neighborhood, where the "boggle" was "eer'd aboot an' aboot." And, moreover, he told a wonderful story of a ghost at Broomhill Towers, which could not be "ralived or rembled oot," even though the old family were gone, and the house had been altered by the new people who had bought the property.

While he was talking of these places an odd idea came into my mind, and holding up the bottle, I exclaimed, "Suppose I try if I can make out something in your past life, for instance, from this wonderful apparatus?"

"I'll give ye leave, Sir," replied the farmer, winking at his friend.

I gazed at the bottle in the prescribed manner for five minutes or more, then I exclaimed:

"I see an old man lying in a bed, and two or three people pressing round him; they give him a pen, and holding his hand, make him sign what I suppose is his will. Now the scene changes, and I see a Court of law; the picture is rather confused, but I fancy I see a man like yourself, only a great deal younger; the Court breaks up, and a number of people come forward and shake you by the hand as if congratulating you."

"Let I look at that 'ottle," cried the farmer. "Why that comes out wonderful; that's the trial about my great-uncle's will."

"Wait a little," said I; "there are other pictures passing before me. I see a farmhouse on fire; people are rushing about. A woman, with a child in her arms, appears at one of the windows; a ladder is placed for her escape, but it is too short. She drops the child into the arms of the people below. There is great excitement; the fire rages; another ladder is brought, and she begins to descend, but misses her footing when half-way down, and falls."

"Good morning, Sir," said the farmer to a clergyman who got in at Weston Junction. "I hope I see you well, Sir?" Without waiting for an answer, he began immediately to give an account of the wonderful revelations of the bottle. "Why, Sir, do ye know," he continued, "it beats the patent ghost all to nothing. This here bottle has the power of making clear all as ever happened to one. I've just heerd the story of the fire at the old farm, which took place when father and mother was first married. Lor', how often I've heerd father tell the story! It war I that war thrown out of the window, and never a bruise nor a scratch did I get; but mother, poor soul, was hurted, and was lame to the day of her death. But Lor', sir, how they do work up this science! I've just been to Lunnon now, and have seen a deal of it. Do 'ee try the bottle again, Sir," he added, addressing me.

I placed the phial at the correct angle, and after some minutes of steady observation, I exclaimed, "I see a young boy climbing a tree, birdnesting I suppose. He seems a daring young fellow, and springs from bough to bough almost like a squirrel. I see a branch catches his watch-chain, and, unknown to him, his watch is pulled out of his pocket and falls into a crevice in the tree. The scene changes to a farm-baton; they are hauling in timber for the sawpit. A gentleman stands there talking to the men; he is something like the boy I saw just now. He looks over the timber as if calculating the measurement, and suddenly he finds a watch embedded in a hole in the wood; he draws it forth, showing it to every one."

"You have made a good hit there, Sir," said the clergyman, "looking up from the pages of the Quarterly. "That circumstance of finding my watch in the hollow of a tree after many years is perfectly true," and so saying he looked very hard at me.

The train at this moment stopping at my destination, I returned the bottle to its owner, and jumping out of the carriage, was about to make my exit from the station, when some one tapped me on the shoulder. "I think I have made a discovery, and found out that the mysterious conjurer is no other than my old schoolfellow, Frank Farrar."

"The same. And you are Charlie Graves," said I to the clergyman who had traveled with me for the last half hour.

We shook hands heartily, and he placed his arm within mine, as if we had only parted yesterday.

"Tell me all about yourself," said he, as we walked along the road to the town of B——.

"I landed from Australia four days ago; when a yearning desire to see my old home coming over me, I took a return ticket from Saturday till Monday, that I might run down and spend my first Sunday in England at my birthplace. I did not intend to see anyone, or make myself known; and fifteen years' roughing it in the bush has pretty well disguised me. Farmer Sellick, who had been my father's tenant for years, never suspected me, though my old love of mischief might have betrayed me. I turned the mesmerised bottle to good account, did I not, Charlie, astonishing the farmers and frightening the two old ladies?"

"Unchanged, I see," replied Graves. "The first time I ever heard of you, you were the delinquent in a practical joke at school. The doctor forgave you oftener than any boy in his class, and liked you better, too. But tell me, have you made your fortune?"

"Not exactly, my dear friend; but I've got a nest egg, and I mean to do better things yet before I die."

"Sanguine as ever; just like your family before you," said Graves in the tone of a man not given to hope much. "Farrar, you must come and stay with me; I have a perpetual curacy at K——, and cross country you can get to Broomhill in an hour. You will remember the old road."

"Well, my dear fellow, if you will have me, I will come in to-morrow and stay the night. I must go back on Monday."

We now parted, for Graves was going home with one of his parishioners, and the gig and its owner were standing in the yard of the Red Lion waiting for him.

On Sunday morning "Marlin bells" rang out the chimes. What a tide of recollections were invoked by those familiar sounds! The trim town looked much as it did of yore, and passing through the quiet streets, I took the well known road to my old home. I had a walk of seven miles before me—an uphill walk, too; but it was like a dream. I could fancy myself a schoolboy again, impatient for my fond mother's greeting; and I thought of those touching words:

'How long since I saw that fair pale face!
O, mother dear, might I only place
My head on thy breast, a moment to rest,
While thy hand on my tearful cheek were prest!'

All are gone; and my beloved home in the hands of strangers. The history may be briefly told. My family had been squires of the parish since the beginning of the seventeenth century; but my grandfather had been an extravagant man, and my father inherited his tastes and his mortgages. Affairs were not flourishing in the boyhood of myself and my brothers; but we were vastly happy, and though somehow not as rich as we might be, we believed that the world could not go on without the Farrars of Broomhill. But the world did manage to do without us; and at my father's death my only remaining brother and myself took the small remnant of our fortune to Australia, where we tried sheep-farming. He, poor fellow, died three years after we went out, and I was left without a near relation in the world.

Musing in melancholy fashion upon the past, I came upon the village green. Every turn in the road, every pollard-tree, was dear to me. I leant upon the well-known gate and gazed upon the winding valley, the glancing trout-stream which fringes Churchman's Copse, and thought of my careless childhood. I turned to the village green and sat down on a fallen tree, for the half-hour bell had only just begun its summons for divine service. How slowly material things change, while one little life spins round so fast! There was the old ash-tree just as I had left it; its withered white boughs pointing upwards to the blue sky. The dilapidated cottages were as picturesque as ever in their decay; the fowls and the pigs as intrusive. The railing and the low wall of the home park had never been repaired since I saw it last. I confess I was rather glad to recognize a certain slovenly air of unthrift; it was so like old times. While thinking what might be done to improve the place, the people were gathering together. "The halt and the lame folk" came first; then the stout farmers and their comely wives and daughters. Joining in with the stream of people, I stood once more under the shadow of the porch.

"The Squire baint t' house; will you sit in his pew, Sir, for you do seem a stranger?" said the clerk.

I followed him, though I required no one to guide me to the well-known corner, where my own initials were cut deep in the old oak in a dozen places; it had been a favorite occupation with my brother and myself during the sermon.

A mist came over my eyes when I looked around at the vacant seats. That had been my mother's place; there my father had sat—I think I see his high-bred but care-worn face; and close beside him used to be that bright young boy, whose half-suppressed mirth often called forth a reprimand from my gentle mother. I fell into a half-unconscious reverie, and caught myself at my old trick of counting the notches on the carved seat ends. The lights and shadows fell just as they did of yore; there had been no "restoration fund" to mend or mar the interior of the old church. I missed the cheery voice of our old vicar—the present man had a peculiarly sad manner. I heard afterwards that he was very unhappy in his family. The text of his sermon was, "I would not live alway." It seemed as if he was speaking to me individually, and the deep melancholy of his tone and words often haunt me now. I don't think the sermon was at all suited to his rustic congregation, judging by the profound slumber of some of my neighbors; but he had one attentive listener, for he had struck a chord of sympathy in my heart which was singularly suited to my overwrought feelings.

The scuffle of many feet roused me from my reverie; and while the clergyman was occupied in dispensing the twelve loaves and twelve shillings left by my grandfather's will to the poor of the parish for ever, I walked round the churchyard.

While I was looking at the memorials of the dead, Farmer Sellick came up. He looked hard at me, then exclaimed,

"Why, if this bain't the gentleman wi' that there magic bottle! Good morning, Sir; didn't expect to see you in these parts; you be a stranger, Sir?"

"Why, Sellick, don't you remember Master Frank, who drove the pigs into the hole in the West Wood mead?"

"Lor', sir, and you be Master Frank all this time, with a beard as thick as a furze-bush! Only think, and I didn't know you, nor your tricks! I'm right glad to see you, Sir;" and with this he gave me a hearty hand-shake.

"A wonderful bottle that, was it not, Sellick?" I observed laughingly.

"There now, I might have known; but I told my missis about it, quite serious, along with all the rest of the science I had seen in Lunnon. But I'm main glad to find that it is a trick; I should be sorry to think that God Almighty allowed of anybody to look backwards and forwards into other people's private matters, without as much as by your leave, or with your leave; business wouldn't hold together at that rate."

Farmer Sellick insisted that I should return to the Hill Farm and take a bit of dinner with them. As we walked over the common I heard all the parish news. It was somewhat hard to hear my birthplace spoken of as the property of a stranger; but when I reflected, I could only say, "Better, far better to begin life unshackled in a new country, than to play the miserable rôle of a poor gentleman at home—clinging to the vain shadow of past prosperity."

"I haven't asked you, Master Frank, if you be married."

"I am not married, Sellick. Ladies are scarce in Australia."

"I thought as you were a young man by your looks," he replied.

"I am afraid I must not say much of that, Sellick, when I remember how long it is since I went nutting in these woods."

"I did not mean that your honor looked young," said the too candid farmer; "but down here we do call everybody a young man as isn't married. Now, when I said I know'd by your looks, I meant you had a free don't-care manner—very different from those who must care, and who have wives at home to make 'em care."

"So you think I am better without a wife?" said I, laughing.

"I don't say that," returned the farmer, "because that would be saying that an empty wagon is better than a loaded one. Yet, for all that, an empty wagon is easier draught; and a load is a load to them as has to draw it."

"So, the new squire is not much liked?" said I changing the subject.

"He's not at all liked; he don't care for the place as if he'd been born here. I fancy he'd sell it again at a profit; in fact he'd do most things for a profit. I do seem—I wish the old place could have been kept in the family."

"Well, Sellick, who knows, some day I may come back a rich man from Australia, and buy the old place again."

"You do mind me of your father, Sir, when you do speak in that fashion. He was always a-hoping and believing in this thing or the other. Now it was a slate quarry, and now it was an iron mine as was going to make matters square again; but I do find that if you waste and muddle at this end and that end, that things won't come square any more. I beg your pardon, Sir, but there was a deal of muddle up at the Hall in your father's time."

With this he rambled on about dishonest agents, unlucky tenants, and the other thousand-and-one bedevilments that beset a country gentleman.

After the farmer's excellent dinner had been discussed, I rose to take my leave, for I had some miles to walk before I should reach K——, the place where my friend the curate was domiciled. When at length I reached the village I captured a small boy, who took me to the clergyman's house. It was a pretty cottage, with a garden before it sheltered from the road by a laurel hedge. A few steps along the gravel walk brought me to the door. I was about to knock with my walking stick, when it was opened by a young lady, who had evidently seen my approach. She offered me her hand cordially, saying: "You are Frank Farrar, my brother's friend, I am sure. Come in; we have been expecting you all the afternoon."

This was a surprise. I had forgotten all about Graves' brothers and sisters, who were very infantine in my day.

"Charlie has been called away to see a poor man who is ill, at the other end of the parish; but he begged me to offer you his excuses. He will soon be back—at least in about an hour. In the meantime what will you have, a cup of tea or a glass of wine? Something you must have after your walk. Supper is a serious meal with us on Sundays; but that will not come off till half-past nine."

I don't know that Ellen Graves struck me at once as being particularly pretty; but her earnest eyes looked truthfully into mine, and her voice was like the sweetest music; there was something in her movements, her manner, or it may have been her smile, that reminded me of my mother.

"I see you don't remember me," she said, with a slight blush, when I tried to identify her as one of the children I had known. "You are thinking of poor Marion, who is dead. I am Ellen—a little, fat fair-haired thing in those days. I remember your frightening me horribly with an electrical machine, which gave us dreadful shocks."

"You must have been very young then?"

"I was 8 when you were 18."

"Is it possible that there is only ten years' difference between us now?" I said, looking at her youthful face and figure.

"I expect the difference is much the same as it used to be," she replied, laughing; "unless you think I am like Lord Dundreary, who in two years became as old as his elder brother."

Ellen made tea for me at a table near the open window, where, as she said, I could smell the flowers and see the sun set. How pretty and refined everything was in this little parsonage! The narrow room looked really elegant; its humble proportions disguised by the hand of taste—a carved wood bracket, a vase, a few bright books, a bit of color—all and each trifles in their way, but happily disposed.

We talked together of the past—of the days of my boyhood—of the traditional friendship between our families—and of many other subjects of mutual interest. It is curious how the ready sympathy of a woman calls out one's innermost thoughts and feelings; for years I had not spoken so unreservedly as I did that evening to the girl whose very existence I had forgotten. My feelings had been battened down below decks during the rough and stormy voyage of my life; but this was a moment of calm weather, and Ellen's voice had a thrilling pathos which reminded me more and more of my mother, the being I had loved best on earth.

We then talked of poetry—not discussing it in a critical spirit, but speaking of its influence as of a friend, whom we mutually found had been the solace of our several lives.

The glow of sunset had now departed; but it was succeeded by that exquisite green track of light in the sky, which always seems typical of something purer and better than "the common light of day." I had taken up a partly-cut copy of TENNYSON which had been lying on the table, and opening it, I read a favorite passage to my now silent companion. I was standing by the window; I had turned from the outer world, and was looking at that fair, earnest, uplifted face, forgetful of self. She was rapt in the music of the poet's words; in a voice alost inaudible she said:

"How true, how beautiful! Read on."

An uncut page arrested my progress, and mechanically I took the return railway ticket from my waistcoat pocket and cut the leaf. At that moment a step sounded on the gravel. Ellen pushed back her chair behind the shadow of the curtain; I put down the book, and stretched out my hand to return the hearty greeting of my schoolfellow. He was profuse in apologies for his absence; hoped I had had some refreshment; and coming into the house, he threw himself into a chair, exclaiming, "I am tired! But where is Ellen? surely she has not left you to entertain yourself?"

"She was here a moment since," I replied, seating myself opposite my hot friend, who was wiping his brow with his handkerchief. "My dear fellow, I am sorry you should have hurried yourself so very much; I am indeed." (I never spoke more truthfully.)

Supper was announced, and we found Ellen in the next room, with a bottle of Rhenish wine in her hand, which she had just brought from the cool cellar. What a delicious little supper we had! A nice chicken mayonnaise that I know my hostess must have made herself, and a tart and custard that could have rejoiced the heart of the post BARCLAY. The curate carved a piece of cold roast beef, and filled my plate with substantial slices, at the same time talking me to give only a secondary attention to his master's kickshaws.

I don't think lights had ever been seen in the cottage windows so late as on that Sunday night. We were a very merry little party; Graves declared that the promise of a living could hardly make him feel happier than did the sight of his old schoolfellow.

I felt as if I had cut my moorings from a land of trouble, and life itself seemed more full of hope than I had seen it for many a day.

But at length the lamp grew dim, and the moonlight streamed through the casement. I looked at my watch, and with a thousand apologies arose to depart to my natural rest.

"We do not keep our little maid up on Sunday night; she has had a long walk twice to church. Let me give you your candle." So saying, Ellen put the light in my hand, and then said, "Good night, I hope you will sleep well," in so sweet a voice that I repeated the words afterwards to myself, as though they had been the refrain of a favorite song.

The next day came with its Monday morning air. I was to go at 12 o'clock, for I had a return ticket, and declined, in consequence, my friend's hospitable request that I should prolong my visit. My preparations were made, and I had only to say good-bye to my old friends, and then I felt I should be a sort of vagabond again, destined to wander again over the earth again without human ties. While so thinking, and in no very pleasant mood, I put my hand in my waistcoat pocket to see that my ticket was there; but, lo, it was gone. I was really annoyed, and searched for it high and low; but without success. For many years of my life I had been obliged to be so strictly economical, that I was vexed, merely from the habit of carefulness.

"Now," said Graves, "there's no excuse; you must stay a couple of days longer."

"Yes, do stay," chimed in his sister; "I want to show you the restorations in the church, and we will visit some of your old haunts. Farmer Brown will lend us his pony-gig; I'll promise to drive you very safely."

Under one pretence and another, I contrived to stay on at the cottage, day after day, till the end of the week; and before it came to an end, I had asked Ellen Graves to be my wife. She did not answer in that sweet voice of hers, but placed both her hands in mine; and I felt as I had never felt since my boyhood—that I had some one to love me. That same evening I took up the volume of TENNYSON that we had read together, when, behold, my return ticket fell out of the book. I had used it to cut the leaf. Fortunate loss!—From Tinsley's Magazine.

THE DEATH OF JACK CADE.—Not wholly beaten, having still hope left of the Kentish people, CADE made his way to Rochester, with the intention of making a new appeal to the oppressed Commons. But it was "too late." His followers had not their leader's courage or honesty of purpose, and fell to fighting about the miserable military chest they had carried away with them. In five days CADE was wholly deserted, and fled for his life. A proclamation was forthwith issued, offering a reward of a thousand marks, for his head, dead or alive, on the ground that he had scorned the King's pardon, and persisted in waging war against the royal authority after terms of surrender and compromise had been agreed upon. Proclamations for the arrest of offenders, whether in civil or criminal cases, are proverbially unfavorable in their descriptions of the personal appearance and antecedents of the persons whom it is sought to capture. In JACK CADE'S case there was no exception to this ancient, and it may be added, this modern rule. He was described as an Irishman, which he was not; as one who had in Surrey, while in the service of Sir THOMAS DACRES, feloniously slain a woman with child, and of having fled to France to escape the consequences of this act, and while there of taking up arms on "the French part" against the English. The proclamation produced speedy effect. The once-popular idol was deserted on every hand; none were so poor as to do him reverence, none so charitable as to give him a crust of bread, or a glass of water in his need; and, like MASANIELLO and RIENZI, he found that the same voices which could cheer and shout in the days of his prosperity, could curse him as lustily in the hour of his calamity. The proclamation was issued on the 10th of July, and on the 15th he was discovered in the garden of one ALEXANDER IDEN or EDEN, in Heathfield, in Sussex, and slain after a desperate defence. His head was taken to London, affixed upon the bridge, and his quarters distributed among the various towns and districts, where the disaffection, of which he was the leader, was supposed to be the most widely spread. One quarter was sent to Blackheath; a second to Norwich, where the Bishop (WALTER HARPE) was supposed to favor the cause of the Duke of YORK; a third to Salisbury, and the fourth to Gloucester, where the Abbot of St. Peter's had influence over the people, and was known, or suspected to be a Yorkist.—All the Year Round.

THE CHINESE INVASION.—The existing demands for labor in our country can hardly be overestimated, even if regarded in the same light in which the all-wise providence of God seems to have viewed this whole matter of the settlement of our Western world, that may seem to us so tardy. There are wants that are felt to be immediately pressing; and this felt pressure is the providential monition that the time for supplying it has come. Labor generally on the Pacific coast is enormously dear, and only at a proportion of prices in other parts of the country, and especially other parts of the world. Domestic labor in San Francisco receives several times the amount of compensation yielded it in the Atlantic cities. The Chinese are in general well fitted to meet our present industrial condition. They have been proved to be admirably fitted to the lighter labor of the household—neat, trustworthy, ready, proverbially economical, careful of their employers' interest as of their own—in short, the very best class of domestics. They have been proved to be efficient laborers in the heavy work of constructing and repairing railroads, of sinking mines and clearing forests, equal to any heavy labor that should be put on human shoulders. The construction of the Pacific Railroad has shown their superiority here to these of any other nation. In mining, too, the patient, economical, persistent Chinaman works out large returns from mines which the unstable, wasteful, impatient white quits in desperate disgust. In agricultural employments they bring an experience, with their capacity for manual labor, that promises the best results in general tillage, by their economy of manures and their careful attention to the details of culture as varied by the season, atmospheric changes and vegetable growth; and in the special production of silk, of tea, and of the smaller fruits. The introduction of Chinese husbandry into our agricultural pursuits can hardly fail of great advantage. In factories they have been found to be equally desirable, rendering enterprises that were just failing from unproductiveness profitable and successful. As clerks, also, in all the diversities of commercial and financial industry they have been proved to be accurate, attentive, quick and faithful.—Professor H. N. Day in the New-Englander.

THE BOAST OF PHILADELPHIA.—But the most notable municipal characteristic, and one which has come down from the earliest period, is the general ownership of houses by those who live in them. When WILLIAM PENN laid out our city, it was with a view to this very thing. That every man might sit under his own vine and fig tree was the object with which he laid out the city, and negotiated with its first settlers. Not a house only, but a garden, did the good old friendly statesman desire to see every Philadelphian in possession of. The model of old Babylon was before his eye, in which the squares, as stiff and angular as our own, were hollow, the houses opening upon beautiful gardens of flowers and fruit trees. The good Quaker's ideal has been, of necessity, abandoned, so far as the gardens were concerned. The demands of business have concentrated the mass of dwellings as closely as in other cities; but, on the other hand, the happy choice of our site has rendered the freest expansion in all directions possible and easy; and that expansion has gone on at an ever-increasing rate in our history, and was never so notable as during the past year.

The distribution of real estate among small owners has also kept pace with our growth, so that HENRY WARD BEECHER was justified in his avowed preference for Philadelphia, on the ground that there a greater proportion of houses was owned by those who lived in them than in any other city in the world. This is due to many causes besides that genial love inherited from PENN. In a city so well placed as ours is for growth, real estate can never rise to the extravagant price that it commands in cities placed as are New-York, Boston, Pittsburg, Cincinnati and St. Paul.

"No pent-up Utica confines our powers,
But a whole boundless continent is ours."

Building material will never be wanting while the best clay beds of the continent lie within the city limits, furnishing brick of a quality so excellent, that it is carried as far as Cincinnati in fact, and imitated in red paint all over the continent; and while our Pennsylvania lime continues in its abundance to fertilize our fields and furnish the bond of unity to our national homes. Then, too, money is more equally distributed in a manufacturing than in a purely commercial community.—Penn Monthly Magazine, Philadelphia.

THE BASTINADO OF THE PAVEMENTS.

A NEW-YORK SKETCH.

When a gentleman from the rural districts of the Union rashly forsakes his own "dirt roads" and fields and woods to finally land among the hackmen of the great Metropolis, he has many trials. The besetments of the "confidence" traps, oroide-watch swindles, gift enterprises, one-dollar sales, friendly scoundrels, polite gamesters, pretty women in distress, cheating trademen and polished and smiling liars, which evils swarm around his greenness, as flies do around a molasses barrel, will all be considered in due time. The first sorrow, after the phlebotomy of the pocket by the hackmen, is the bastinado by the pavements. In all probability Mr. Green has been wearing leaky old boots for a month, with the intention of buying his new ones in New-York. Say that he gets in town on Saturday, and, after breakfast, goes out on the great Way, and stops at the first inviting place to buy a pair of calfskins, fine as kid and soft as a glove. He is invited to the pew of the City friend, on the Avenue, and is confident that the pretty daughter of the friend will sit by his side, and respect him for those boots. He respects himself. Is not his understanding mailed in City leather? He improves the day by a general walk, including the dirty Battery, the tall Trinity and a few miles of the up-town streets. He could march thirty miles a day in the late war, and exceed that, in a possum hunt, at home. He goes to bed, rather confident that he can do the City in another day on foot, and a little tired—not from the walk—oh no! but from the railroad travel!

The next morning he wakes up at daylight, as usual, but finds the bed quite comfortable, and the lack of fire is a good excuse not to get up. Finally the sound of early Sunday-school bells reminds him of the new boots and the pretty daughter, and he leaps to the floor. What an awfully hard floor, and how it hurts his feet! It can't be gout, and it is not frost-bite; but his feet are sore, and look white and puffy.

The joints, too, are stiff, and the muscles feel sore at every motion. In dismay at this causeless lameness, he thinks of going to bed for the day, but the boots forbid.

So the feet are bathed in icy water; and, feeling better, Mr. Green essays to draw on the boots. Yesterday there was the perfect and easy fit of the glove, without crease or wrinkle. Now they won't go on at all! At last, after strains and pulls, that make his face look like a boiled lobster or a punished infant, and the bursting of straps and buttons, one of them is on, and the foot stamped down into it. That rash stamp is not repeated, for it has evoked a groan of agony, and the foot feels a little as if it were boiled, while the whole man is in a fever.

He can't stand it, and won't, and the boot is lucky that gets off with no aid from the penknife. The discarded leaky boots, that came so near going into the ash barrel yesterday, are taken from under the bed, and prove only less tight than the new; while the calm, Sabbath frame of mind is vastly improved, as the victim lifts his curtains to see that the two-inch snow, that fell on Saturday night, is an ocean of slush on Sunday morning. A fashionable church, and the beauty with the Grecian bend in lace and velvet, would never do with those old boots, and one Sunday is spoiled.

He rests till Monday, and the feet don't get well. He starts for another walk with wet feet, and don't enjoy himself. The rural athlete who expected to stride down Broadway with squared shoulders, front like a locomotive and step of a King, finds himself as meek as a suck pig; disposed to get out of everybody's way; afraid of other boots on his toes; humbly respectful to the phenomenon in white nightgown and rainbows, who distributes the cards of a corn doctor; disposed to take off his hat before an advertising banner on a pole; and saying "thank you, my dear," to the girl at the peanut stand, who gives him counterfeit postal currency in change.

The walk of a dozen squares convinces him that the change from the soft, springy soil and withered grass, or oak-leaf carpet of the home plantation, or farm, has done the mischief. He remembers to have read how the Turks punish offenders by beating them with sticks on the soles of the naked feet, and of his old wonder how almost painless blows on so tough a place could become such horrible torture when multiplied by one or two hundred. He remembers that the hard stone of the City sidewalk or street had struck a blow upon his feet at every step, and that the gay shops and distant spires had led him on and on, while he unknowingly endured the steady bastinado of the pavement.

Plowed ground, Autumn leaves, Summer dust or Winter mud had never been poetic and charming to him before, and he would give the new boots to be there. The punishment is going on as he thinks about it, and he turns to the hotel for rest. No policeman offers to guide his limping steps across Broadway. In the midst the traitor feet desert his perpendicular, and depart from beneath him separate ways. He finds himself calmly seated in the softest and deepest slush of the nasty street, with the black fluid compounded by snow and horses, slowly penetrating beneath the coat tails to the skin. He sees fifty omnibuses rushing at him from every point of the horizon. He is rescued, he don't know how, and don't care. He departs from the city a wiser man, and resolved never again to do a City on foot, without some weeks' previous practice in the hands of a Turkish executioner. H. THE WORLD STILL YOUNG.—A very conclusive proof has been furnished of the inexpediency and unwarrantableness of some of those sweeping conclusions, as to the age of the world and similar matters, which we have of late been summoned in the name of science to make. Geologists, looking to the various strata of the globe, and considering the length of time that would probably be required to form each, by deposition from liquid matter, have been in the way of calculating that to form the whole, millions upon millions of years must have been required. The supporters of the Darwinian theory of the origin of species, who suppose that the various orders of living creatures have been formed by varieties arising in the course of inconceivably lengthened periods of time, from a few primitive forms—perhaps from a single form—have maintained that these indefinite geologic periods of time furnished ample opportunity for the slow progress of the changes in which they believe. But various things have lately occurred to curtail sadly the indefinite periods which the Darwinians and geologists have been wont to claim. One of these is the result of deep-sea dredgings which have lately taken place. The bottom of waters so deep that the highest of the Alps might be buried under them, has lately been explored. Dredges have brought up so much as a half ton of mud from the depth of 14,000 feet, and the temperature of the water has been ascertained where the pressure is so enormous as 490 tons on any square foot of surface. Living creatures have been found to exist at the depth of two or three miles. Though dwelling in what seems to us absolute darkness, they have eyes perfectly developed—apprehending light probably, whether phosphorescent or common, by a process quite unknown to us. More than this, and more to our present purpose, it has been found that at one and the same time deposits of quite different kinds are going on at the bottom of the sea within a few miles of each other—here a chalk deposit, and there a sandstone deposit, each with its characteristic orders of animals. If such deposits are going on contemporaneously now, they may have been going on contemporaneously at former periods of our earth's history; and thus the theory that they were all formed in successive ages, and that the sum of these ages made up a period long enough for any Darwinian changes, falls absolutely to the ground.—Sunday Magazine, Edited by Dr. Guthrie.

SECRET SOCIETIES.—Secret fraternities have existed at all times and in all countries. Egypt invented the division of the initiated into different degrees; and the celebrated mysteries of Greece were of Egyptian origin. In Persia, ZOROASTER is believed to have introduced the Egyptian mysteries; and the secret initiations of the Mithraics were found upon the doctrines of the Magi. The Romans adopted the religious mysteries of the nations they conquered; and the Dionysia, when introduced into Italy, degenerated into the scandalous orgies of the Bacchanalia. In China, in India and in Russia, we find that secret fraternities have existed from the earliest historical period.

The most important initiations of ancient times were those of the Magi, of Egypt, and of Greece. The Magi are said to have had three different degrees, and the firmness and courage of the candidate were proved by severe trials. The mysteries of Mithra claim particular attention, as it is probable that the early Christians, under the permitted symbols of the Mithraic rites, worshipped the Son of God in safety. The Mithraics were not the only secret society which arose on the foundations of Magism for the dark speculations of Manes had the same origin, and some traces of its influence may be found among the Albigenses, and in the secret history of the Knights Templars. Egypt seems to be the picture of a continual initiation into mysteries; the sacred obelisks, the labyrinth, the human-headed birds, have long remained a mystery to many of us, and were probably always a mystery to that Egyptian people which silently and patiently raised the Pyramids. All the symbols which the uninitiated in modern times have beheld without understanding, in all probability formed the language of one of the most extensive and energetic secret fraternities which have ever existed. If, however, in Egypt the priests of Isis had once been the powerful rulers of the people, and the depositaries of a secret science, at Rome, in later times, the poor priests lived a solitary vagabond life, without a temple, carrying in their arms the statue of Isis, and offering initiation to all who would pay for it. To such a depth of degradation had the once-dreaded mysteries fallen. PYTHAGORAS founded at Crotona a society in imitation of the Orphic mysteries, but political struggles soon destroyed it; his disciples, however, maintained his doctrines for some time, and the name of Pythagoreans has been adopted by many of the societies of the Middle Ages and of modern times. The initiations of Greece had especially a moral object; the mysteries were a practical and representative philosophy, formed into an institution that it might be preserved with greater safety. In the mysteries the worship of nature held a principal place.—The American Odd Fellow.

A CHAPERON'S LAMENT.—"A Dying Chaperon" thus recounts her sorrows in the Pall Mall Gazette: "The London season is close at hand, and the present moment is not inopportune for calling attention to the uncomfortable rapidity with which modern society has grown, and the inconvenient proportions it has assumed. I speak feelingly, and with the voice of experience, for it has been my misfortune to chaperon three daughters through several seasons, which have told upon me severely, and the doctors inform me I cannot last through another. Two of my daughters, alas! remain on my hands; but Fatima, the eldest, married last year. For five years, day and night, I worked very, very hard to obtain a position for her, without success; until, acting upon the advice of a kind old friend, I withdrew her from the public gaze altogether for two years, and then reproduced her, after her sisters, as an entire novelty. This innocent trick answered admirably. A middle-aged literary man, with weak eyes, who had spent some years traveling in the East, on his return home discovered the rare qualities of my eldest daughter, and he is now my son-in-law. He has something else besides literature to depend upon, which is fortunate for himself—and, I may add, for literature also, for, although a great blessing to me, I don't think he is really very wise. My anxieties are now, therefore, limited to the two youngest of my flock, and I can assure you that, great as is the mental strain, it is more than equaled by the physical. London is not what it used to be a few years ago. Society, as it is called, was small, compact and comfortable; it is now scattered, unwieldy and fatiguing to the last degree. I can remember the time when poor Lady PALMERSTON'S old house in Carlton House Terrace held the whole of it. She afterwards managed to squeeze it into Cambridge House; but now a dozen Cambridge Houses would not hold it. In the days I am recalling, people really knew each other, and I believe some few actually cared for each other. Society could be grasped as a whole, and was a pleasant gathering of friends. Since then, miles upon miles of new streets have arisen; every distant country place has its railroad to London; and although society has increased in like proportions, its arrangements remain unaltered. The consequence is that, so far from being pleasant, it would be difficult to imagine a more disagreeable ordeal to pass through than a London season in modern days. It is still considered necessary to know everybody, and to go everywhere; but there are few houses built which can contain an assemblage of everybody—and when they are built, few people can afford to live in them. Then nob one wife?' Here Mme. R., curious to know the question, opened her great black eyes half suspiciously, and said, on the instant the translation was given: 'If he had another, I would strangle her!' and, with equal quickness, turned on us saying: 'But why is it that Madame has but one husband?' To this we could make but one reply, and that the one previously given by her, in answer to our numerous other questions: 'It is our law—it is our religion!' Here a neat, bright-eyed mulatto girl, who proved to be our acquaintance of the night before at the religious rites, appears, and brings in a low table or stool. She follows it with a silver salver, on which were china cups in silver filigree holders, filled with odorous coffee. Napkins of the length of a towel, with embroidered golden ends, were unfolded for each, and laid upon our laps; then the sugared coffee, without cream or spoons, was passed, followed with blocks of fig paste, handed to us in spoons. Both were very good, and hosts were kindly urgent that we should partake again; but glancing at the time, I found, to my horror, that we had but twenty minutes to reach the hotel, pack our trunks, and leave for Blidah! I will not answer for our hasty adieu, or the impression left on our hosts by the hurried manner of our exit, but in a few words of thanks for their great kindness, and good wishes for the future of Mademoiselle the elder, we descended the stairway and literally rushed for hotel and railroad." Thus endeth the journal.

From this chance conversation thus reported, one may perceive what does not appear on the surface, that there is a good deal of inflammable material in Algiers growing out of French domination and these heterogeneous elements of society. A spark may make a tremendous explosion some day, even in the midst of Algiers.—"A Search for Winter Sunbeams" by Samuel S. Cox, New-York.

PEGGY'S AFTERNOON NAP.

A STORY FOR THE YOUNG.

It was a blazing afternoon in Summer when little Peggy Bevan staggered down the shaggy mountain side, with a great creel piled high with fresh cut grass upon her back. She had thought that she would never be able to toil up Cefn Madoc—the sun beat down so, and the creel pulled back so, and the brown grass and the gray stones of the hillside were both so slippery; and now she began to think that she could never reach the valley beneath unless she rolled down into it. There was not wind enough even to wave the pale blue harebells. Lizards basked on the hot, hoary boulders. The black-faced little mountain sheep lay panting in hollows that gave them the merest fringe of shade. The black mountain ponies impatiently whisked off the plaguing flies with their long, rusty, ragged, bur-buttoned tails. Not a single bird was singing anywhere around. Now and then a rabbit slipped out of the patches of fern and furze, or flung up its heels, as if it were taking a header as it plunged into them again; but these were exceptionally restless rabbits. The vast majority of their more sensible comrades were napping in the coolest corners of their burrows, postponing frolic until the dew had begun to fall. All the country seemed asleep in the sunshine—the brown hills, the tiny green "parks," the golden-ening corn patches, the clumps of dusky trees, the tumble-down straggling limestone walls, the dogrose-wreathed lime-kilns, the sloping stony bed of the dried-up river, the mossy mottled bridge that spanned it like a V turned upside down, the mouldering village churches nodding over their coffin-shaped flower beds, the crumbling ivy-clad remnants of the three old ruined castles, the box-like little meeting-houses, the thatched whitewashed little cottages and farmhouses with no gates to their farmyards. Everything looked asleep, except far off where the coal-pits raised their tall chimneys and gibbeted wheels, and blotched the countryside with boils of black rubbish; and, under the thicker smoke beyond, where the dingy town huddled at the bottom of the long, bright-blue, sail-dotted bay. But the pits and the town were so far off that they only made Cefn Madoc seem all the drowsier to little Peggy Bevan. The very railway at the bottom of the mountain had nothing bustling in it. The rails shone like gold in the sunshine, little blue butterflies were fluttering dreamily over them, and a row of sleepy sparrows stood on one of the up rails as if they were roosting. Peggy meant to ask for a drink at Evan Evans, the pointsman's cottage; but when she got there, she found that no one was at home except Evan, and he was lying asleep in his shirt sleeves, with a half-smoked pipe in his mouth, in the shade of a little grove of hollyhocks that rested their heavy, claret-colored blossoms on the thatch of the cottage as if they wanted to go to sleep too. So on poor thirsty little Peggy had to trudge with her creel of grass behind her, waddling like a crab covered with shells and seaweed. The proper crossing was a bridge over the points about a hundred yards from the pointsman's cottage, but Peggy was so tired with her long walk, and she had still to climb up a good bit of the mountain on the other side of the railway before she got home, that she determined to take the shortest cut. There was a gap in the railway fence just at the bottom of Evan's garden, and through that she pushed her wearying load. This was why she was carrying it: Her grandmother's cow, Spot, was ill; and as Peggy had no brothers or sisters, no father or mother—only a grandmother, who was not quite as kind to the little girl as she might have been—Spot was Peggy's bosom friend. She herded Spot on the hillside, and chopped up her furze and potatoes for her, and put her arms round Spot's neck and cuddled her, and talked to her in the dark little cow-house that joined on to the cottage. As soon as she was allowed to milk Spot, Peggy thought that she would be perfectly happy. Spot's sweet breath seemed sweeter than violets to Peggy, and there was a white star on Spot's fawn-colored face which Peggy used to kiss in a way that seemed highly ridiculous to the crabbed old grandmother.

But now poor Spot was ill. She would not touch the coarse mountain grass, and merely snuffed at the furze and potatoes. All day long she stood with her head hanging over the half-door of the cow house, every now and then giving a melancholy little low. The grandmother, who looked very much like Mother Hubbard, in her scarlet whittle and spectacles and tall black hat, had said a charm over Spot, but it had not done her a mite of good. The farrier had promised to come up from Llanrwst and have a look at her, but in the meantime poor Spot starved, and Peggy was in deep distress.

So on this broiling Summer afternoon she had toiled to the gray cromlech on the other side of Cefn Madoc, to cut the rich grass which grew there round the Faries' Well, thinking that it might tempt poor Spot to eat.

Anxious as she was to get back to her friend, however, Peggy, when she had pushed her load on to the railway, and had scrambled through the gap herself, could not help stopping to enjoy the relief of lightened shoulders. She was almost dead-beat, poor little girl. The high piled grass was a tempting pillow. Down she sat for a minute, as she thought, on the rough ballasting, with her arm on the grass, which was cool in spite of the baking it had got, and her heavy little head on her aching little arm.

And then, suddenly, Peggy was back at the Faries' Well, and Spot was there too, drinking the clear, cold, crystal water, and wrenching up great mouthfuls of the juicy grass. But a spiteful little fairy climbed up to the top of the cromlech, and pelted Spot with hollyhocks; and the hollyhocks hurt, for they were hard as stones, and Spot began to low as if she did not like it. So Peggy tried to drive away the fairy, but he jumped on to her back, and clasped his hands round her neck so tight that she was nearly throttled. And then Peggy could not find Spot. The sheep and the ponies knew where she was, but they would not tell; and a grimy tip-girl came along, with buskins on and a red handkerchief tied round her head, and filled the creel with coals, and said that Peggy must carry it across the sea to Ireland. But Peggy went into Llanrwst Churchyard instead, only the Calvinistic Methodist Chapel, where Peggy went to Sunday school, was in the churchyard and not the church; and then the chapel turned into Llanrwst Castle, and Granny was climbing up the ivy to catch Spot, who was scratching her head over the creel on the very top of the castle, trying to get out to eat the wallflowers. Granny had almost climbed to the top, when the farrier gave a jump out of his pew, where he had been smoking his pipe in his shirt-sleeves, and tugged at Granny's petticoats. Granny pulled down the ivy, and that pulled down the castle. Peggy could see it coming, but she could not move, though she was lying right under it. And yet she did not feel afraid, because Spot was breathing in her face, and she was feeding Spot with hollyhocks. Granny gave an awful scream and down came the castle in a cloud of dust, and with a thud that shook the ground and thundered round the hills.

When Peggy awoke, her creel was knocked over, and her frock was out of gathers. Evan Evans, looking very white and angry, was swinging her by the petticoats like a sign of the Golden Fleece. His danger-flag lay between the rails, with the staff snapped in two. The up express was rattling over his points; the engine driver and stoker craning over the tender as they looked back with scared faces, and young Evan Evans was leaning on the switch. Most fortunately the pointsman's boy was with him when he saw Peggy lounging against the rail, just after he had sighted the express train shooting, half smothered in black and white clouds, out of the Llanrwst tunnel. Waving his flag, he had rushed down the line to the rescue, and just saved Peggy. The off buffer of the engine nearly grazed him as he sprang across the metals, and swung Peggy out of danger. Evan was very much out of breath, and he was also very much out of temper; but for all that was a kind-hearted religious man, and when he had recovered his breath and his temper, he said in Welsh, "We ought both to thank God, my wench." And he helped Peggy to put the grass back in her creel, and when he knew why she had gathered it, he called young Evan to help her carry it up the hill.

Granny scolded Peggy sadly because of the torn frock, but Peggy was consoled when she saw how Spot enjoyed the Fairies' Well grass.

She could not help thinking, however, that it was rather hard that her friend should eat it so composedly, when it had so nearly cost her her life. CHARLES CAMDEN.

NEAR-SIGHTED MEN.—It is an annoyance at meals, an annoyance in all public places, in church, the lecture room, or the theatre; an annoyance in the street, an annoyance in journeyings, an annoyance by night as well as by day. A near-sighted man goes down the steps with fear and trembling, as he comes out from the lighted hall into the dark night. To him landmarks are indistinct, and metes and bounds invisible. He mistakes a pool for the solid soil, and walks into a canal as he would cross the highway. He climbs a mountain only to find the landscape a blur before his view. The glasses which he wears are a perpetual nuisance, to be shifted on and off as his field of vision is changed—a plague as they are kept, and a despair when they are lost; and they are always lost just when they are most wanted, on a pedestrian tour, or in a public assembly. The damsel who wears them knows that they hide the light of her eye, yet without them her eye has no light. No contrivance of form, no richness of gold or shell, can make the double glass sit gracefully on the nose of a fair virgin. The Venus, the Fornarina, St. Agnes or St. Cecilia would lose all beauty and saintliness with this ugly addition to their charms. Eye glasses, for man or woman, are in the season of youth, never better than a necessary evil, troublesome at the first and hateful with increasing years. They enslave the freest soul and will, and make their captive exclaim often with the Christian Apostle, "Wretched that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death." Dr. JOHN BROWN, in his ingenious essay, will have it that Paul's thorn in the flesh was weakness of the eyes. But it is more probable that Paul was near-sighted, and was miserable because he had no glasses to wear. That cause may explain his many tears and groanings. A near-sighted man without glasses can never do a full apostolic work.—Rev. C. H. Brigham, in the Herald of Health, (New-York.)

Theatrical Rivalry Among the Chinese of San Francisco—A Small Army Dispersed by the Police.

From the San Francisco Bulletin, Feb. 3.

The Chinese new year is not progressing with entire harmony. Yesterday great excitement existed among the rival clans of that people, and a bloody riot seemed at one time imminent. For a long time past the theatre on Jackson-street has been in operation, and enjoyed a large share of the Celestial patronage. A few weeks ago the old Dupont-street theatre was re-opened by the See Yup Company, but they did not do well, and yesterday they concluded that it would be best to break up the business of their rivals on Jackson-street. Accordingly a large crowd was sent down, which took possession of the entrance of the house to keep people from going in. Finally a woman came along who was at once attacked, knocked down, and beaten. Officer DUFFIELD saw the outrage, and he undertook to arrest the man who took the lead in it. He had a hard struggle, the Chinamen attacking him on all sides, but he blew a whistle for help, and other officers came. The Chinamen kept their ground, but DUFFIELD got his prisoner and marched him to the Station House. He came back, and with Officer GARRITY, undertook to drive the crowd away, but they resisted, and pelted the officers with everything they could lay their hands on to throw.

The conflict was a very unequal one till Captain DOUGLAS arrived on the ground with heavy reinforcements. A brief council of war was held in the middle of Jackson-street, and the order was given to disperse the crowd. The Police drew their batons and made a rush on the See Yup army, which was about 1,500 strong. The centre broke at once, but the two wings wavered, and all fled as if panic struck up Jackson to Stockton. Clubs were freely used, and many doors and windows were broken in the rush. After that there was only occasional desultory skirmishing and several captures of belligerent fellows. About 2,000 people are collected in the vicinity, and a strong force of Police remains to preserve the peace and prevent the anticipated riot.

A Very Lively Beast in Oregon.

A correspondent of the Salem (Oregon) Statesman, writing from Polk County, sends the following interesting statement:

"A huge monster was captured last week on Soap Creek, near the south line of Polk County, by several farmers by the names of MILLER and TRIPP. It has the head, feet and ears of a lion; is about three feet high, and between seven and eight feet long; the color of a grizzly bear; tail like a wolf, about fifteen inches long; arms eighteen inches in circumference; breast and throat about as large as a three-year-old horse. The animal has been the terror and scourge of that part of the country for several years, destroying horses, cattle, hogs and sheep. It has been repeatedly hunted with the best trained bear dogs in the country, but always whipped its pursuers and sometimes killed them. The dogs once fought it so courageously that it took a large willow tree; but the tree broke down under its weight; it did not want to fight, being too full of mutton, but when the tree broke down it sailed in and made dog hair fly and dog blood flow, till they were glad to retreat and let it alone. It never was known to attack persons but once; then it attacked a couple of school boys, who frightened it away with matches. It is said to have infested that part of the country for about twenty years, growing bolder every year, till within the last year or two it got to coming around the farm houses at night, and sometimes killed the watch-dog almost on the door, and this Winter it killed a pet deer on Mr. BLAKE'S doorstep. It was an implacable enemy to dogs. It seemed to fully understand the character of gunpowder, and always kept out of the way of any one with firearms. It was caught by one hind leg in a bear trap, set for it by Mr. MILLER at a drift where it was in the habit of crossing Soap Creek. When they found it the leg was bitten off, except the hamstrings, and this would have been if it had not spent too much of its rage on the trap and broken out all its teeth before it got the leg entirely off.

The Portland (Oregon) Herald adds to the above, that if the monster will only come to Portland he shall have a full new set of teeth in place of the ones broken off by the trap, and as for the correspondent——

Associate Justice John W. Longyear.

From the Detroit Advertiser, Feb. 9.

As has been anticipated for some time, Hon. JOHN W. LONGYEAR has been nominated for Judge of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Michigan, and will be confirmed, of course. His principal competitors were Hon. HOVEY K. CLARK, of this city, and JOHN S. NEWBERRY, Esq., of this city, both able men, of high character, and well known lawyers; but after Mr. EMMON'S appointment it became very clear that the District Judge would not come to Detroit. Mr. LONGYEAR is, and has been for many years, a resident of Lansing, where he is universally respected and has enjoyed a large practice, not appearing, however often in the United States Courts. He is a native of Ulster County, N. Y., having been born at Shandaken, in that county, Oct. 22, 1820. He removed to this State in 1844, and was admitted to the bar in 1846. He was elected to the Thirty-eighth Congress in 1863, and again to the Thirty-ninth in 1864, Hon. AUSTIN BLAIR being his successor. He also had a liberal support for Justice of our State Supreme Court at the time Judge GRAVES was nominated. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1867, of late years Mr. LONGYEAR has been in rather feeble health, which has somewhat interfered with his active practice. The long delay in appointing a Judge for this district has made a great accumulation of business and been unfavorable to not a few interests. We doubt not Mr. LONGYEAR will be cordially welcomed by the Bar, and trust that he will find his new relations pleasant.

ART IN ITALY.

American Sculptors' Abroad—Their Condition and Prospects—Outlays and Profits—Interesting Facts and Figures.

From Our Own Correspondent.

FLORENCE, Tuesday, Jan. 18, 1870.

The arrival year after year in Italy of Americans practicing art in the Department of Sculpture, suggests an inquiry as to their prospects of success. Italy is found to be an excellent field for the prosecution of art with reference to money profit. That it has always been one of the best schools for academic instruction all the world knows. Of course, all, or nearly all, works of art produced by American sculptors and painters go to America, rapidly becoming, as it is, the country in which is found large numbers of rich and liberal purchases of art productions of every kind. It is the good fortune of Americans that they need look only to their own countrymen; nor need they look long in vain for a golden return for any kind of art labor which has the least claim to reward or praise.

The history of American sculpture is mostly comprised in the period of the past quarter of a century, and the process of its rapid development is interesting. GREENOUGH and CRAWFORD were first heard of; then followed POWERS, and since a dozen others who have equaled, and in some respects, surpassed these in the quality of their productions. POWERS is no longer regarded as a wonder by his countrymen, for the inspection of many works by gifted rivals, who have entered the field later, has dissipated many of the old illusions. After the death of CRAWFORD this artist had for a little while none among his compatriots with whom to measure his ability. Since then the struggle for preëminence, even in newspaper praise, has been abandoned, and each is taking the place assigned by public criticism to slowly and painfully-discovered merit. POWERS is a bust-maker, and in that, the lowest walk of art, he has reached the highest place; but even in such excellence, BALL, and CONNELLEY, and JACKSON, and perhaps others, dispute with him preëminence.

We have now nearly thirty sculptors practicing in Italy, and the principal stimulus of this rapid development has come from the liberal compensation made for art labor of this sort. On a small foundation of talent, with a certain amount of academic training, success in sculpture has been attained, and the road to fortune opened with less fatigue than generally accompanies respectable literary effort. Ten and twelve thousand dollars is the price which has been frequently paid for a portrait statue of heroic size, or eight feet in height, of a public personage, to be placed as a monument in some one of our cities. The actual cost of the marble and labor on such a statue in Florence or Rome is from $1,500 to $2,000. All the rest goes to pay the artist for his clay model, which, after his first sketch or study is completed, generally occupies him from three to six months. It is very well known to those who have opportunity to pay attention to such matters that, after a sculptor has finished his clay model his work is done, as he rarely or never touches the marble; that being little more than a mechanical process, to be left to trained workmen, with only necessary oversight on the part of the artist. How many there are who still think that the statue which they see and admire in its harmonious perfection is the product of the "artist's chisel"—as the phrase is—whose name the statue bears. We hear constantly that such a sculptor "finishes perfectly," when his hand has had nothing to do with the work after the clay model was finished. Only his eye and directing mind have followed the process with that sense of responsibility demanded by reputation already gained or yet to be won. BALL and CONNELLEY have $750 for a portrait bust, and the price demanded by POWERS is $1,000. All but $100, the price paid for the piece of marble and the work, is the profit which goes to the sculptor for his clay model, which costs him the labor of a week or ten days. The beautiful ideal of "Proserpine," by POWERS, which has been repeated well towards a hundred times, and which is always under the hands of the workmen, is sold for $400 or $500. The cost of making it is about $80. An ideal statue, sold for $4,000 or $5,000, costs the artist for marble and work $1,500. As soon as the clay model has passed from his hands to be manipulated upon in marble, the artist is free to begin a new design. In that, all or nearly all of his merit for invention begins and ends.

American sculptors are paid prices twice as great as Italian artists demand, and more, probably, than the artists of any other nation receive. Many of them are already in the enjoyment of fortune, the fruit of not very extended periods of labor. It is something to rejoice at and be proud of, that the nation, the youngest in art, has been so liberal. And this generous reward is the secret of the rapid progress made. There is a good deal of talk about genius—a greatly absurd term; but it is much with the art of sculpture as it is with any other kind of labor; demand, supply and liberal pay keep the tide at flood. A moderate degree of talent, with academic training, or in the absence of it, of careful groping, or patient application, will, in time, enable the artist to have something to show.

A great advantage enjoyed by American artists here, in addition to the lower price of material and labor, is that they find their traveling countrymen with the leisure to give a more sympathetic examination to their works. The fever of our hurrying life, for a time soothed by quiet contemplations, gives the opportunity for the fancy to be captivated by beauty. Not a few cases are recorded of rich men who have made their fortunes by their own effort, who have strolled through the studios, as one of the things to be done in the Italian tour, and for the first time become interested in the artist and his works. The purchase of something often follows, and every bust or statue sold is another stone by which the artist climbs to eminence. They are generally satisfied and grateful. The only croaking I have heard has come from the one who has longest enjoyed the favor of his countrymen, but now least content to see new rivals in the field, who only ask to share the praise and profit before bestowed only on a few. No one can set limits to the development of the picture if it goes on in proportion to the past. Among two or five hundred sculptors which the next fifty years may give us, there may be few great artists; but it has been the same in every country in all time.

These remarks are made not to betray secrets which the artists would prefer to have kept, but to give the public information necessary to a better appreciation of the labor of those so handsomely rewarded. Many interesting facts may be communicated, known only to those who have had opportunity to learn them by a great many years of observation. These may be given in future letters, for the subject is never exhausted, and art furnishes a theme sufficiently fascinating to all capable of an aspiration above the vulgar common-places of existence. Art gives the last polish to civilization, and, like religion, makes man capable of an enjoyment above that of his brute instincts, and is the instrument for ennobling both domestic and civil life. The Strange Companion of a Springfield Youth.

From the Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

There are in the lives of many of us singular experiences which we cannot account for to ourselves. One such experience persistently haunts at times a young man of this city—the sense of something at his side without noise or substance; something impalpable to touch or to the finer sense of sight, but felt through every nerve and in the secret strongholds of the mind itself, and visible to the inner vision. This ghostly companion is half human, half undefined; its features, vague and varying as a mist or a cloud, are always deathlike and foreboding. It moves in even pace with his feet, stops as he stops, and repeats each motion of his. The inexplicable visitant comes unwarned, at an instant, and usually at night, as the subject of its calls spends solitarily home. The ghost, if ghost it be, does not choose the dim-enshrouding dusk, but the most brilliant moonlight, for its communion; and sometimes its appalling presence suddenly smites upon its loth companion's consciousness in the midst of a crowded street. It never has entered a house, but will its call upon the gentleman's side as he turns the key, and the next instant—gone. The object of this phenomenal devotion has no superstition in the matter; he utterly scorns the imbecile gropings of spiritualism; and is content to resign the mystery to a place among the many mental phenomena whose rules we cannot grasp.

THE SEWING WOMEN.

How They are Swindled—Incidents of Life Among the Lowly—How Some "Keep Soul and Body Together."

When DE QUINCEY essayed writing up "Murder as One of the Fine Arts," descanting in his own effective fashion upon connoisseurs, amateurs, dilettanti in the science,—in short, "murder-fanciers,"—it is plain he had not yet come to consider the existence and mutual relations of New-York workingwomen and their employers.

Had the indicated system come up in his day in all the enormity in which it now glares upon the eyes of even those who, for politic ends, "wink" at it, the famous essay had been long lengthened out, and with the magical touch of his pen the exposers of artistic sixth commandment-breakers had made some of our City doings the culminating point of the drama, wherein street cutthroats and highwaymen figure.

Not so?

Then what do you call it, this defrauding them of the just wages of daily work that is practiced upon women, so dependent for daily bread, in this community?

See the "Complaint Book" at the Workingwomen's Union in Bleecker-street.]

"I give you only such points as I know to be reliable," says the officer in charge to the reporter.

"Here is a record, to which I would like to invite your attention. It is of a widowed mother and daughter, living in the utmost poverty in an attic, in —— street. They are ladylike and educated people, have seen better days, and, by the way, are of a class as much or more to be pitied than any that come under our observation—a class to whom the privations and actual stings of poverty are harder to bear patiently, perhaps, because the sufferers have been reared in luxury. Then these people, from pride of birth or pride of education, possibly both, would not tell their wants and seek relief, as persons often will who have been accustomed to obtain it this way."

Well, the story went—this mother and daughter sewed early and late at the poor wages that workers at this employment so well know how to estimate; went with carpetless floor in their little room, used fuel by the handful, ate a meal when they could indulge themselves in one, and often went hungry to bed; saving the little means they could save—for what? Had they grown penurious, these two females? Miserly? Speculative, perhaps? Emulous of Erie, or ambitious of City stocks?

No, they wanted to invest in a little business matter which we are not permitted to mention here; an humble little enterprise, merely a something that, let it turn out its best, might only yield a revenue that would, with care, "keep soul and body together," possibly in a less precarious fashion than that by which they were already abiding.

A rich Broadway merchant's wife called one day,—a job for the two workingwomen. A pair of handsome traveling dresses were to be made up, elaborately trimmed,—and that "elaborate" means something in these days of indispensable furbelows and frills and puffs and quiltings. The splendid material was brought out, the wife and daughter of the merchant were fitted, a Canadian trip in view.

"Stitch, stitch, stitch!"

our two poor women sewed for the two rich women. That was well! God didn't intend all should be poor, nor that all should be rich.

In the interim, however, and by the time the dresses were completed, the Canadian friend, to whom the visit was to have been made, came down suddenly, by some chance, to New-York, and by some other chance growing out of the circumstances, the original programme was abandoned.

No use, then, for the traveling dresses! Rich Mrs. Blank couldn't afford to lose the investment, and so poor Mrs. Blanker must take it off her hands. That was the decision evolved of her noble system of ethics.

The woman of wealth would permit (!) her poor sewing sister to pay her the price of the goods incontinently consumed into traveling dresses that were superfluous, but she must take the chance to sell them, and get remuneration for labor and time and money invested; in short, we run our pen through that note of interrogation above, and say with truth that she tried to compel the poor women to buy her trumpery from her.

They didn't agree. They had worked for their money, but now they must earn it another way—run for it, and yet another way—beg for it. The female Dives was inexorable. Months passed in this way; they had been offered the dresses that they could easily get so much for if sold; they refused; they should have nothing. Time and labor were going all this while, as well as the other deprivation incident to the transaction, for when the widow or her daughter were running away up to —— street the sewing machine or some other regularly-employed labor implement was still. The climax of all was, that after long months, as has been said, the case was put into the hands of the association named just now, and their generous and efficient young attorney succeeded in wringing the money from the hands of the unwilling debtors.

There is on our record of abuses a somewhat similar case—that of a negro woman who did machine work. She came to a lady of our acquaintance to make complaint that she had been making female garments for a furnishing store in the City. The cloth given out was of the flimsiest, "war-made" cotton cloth, as she called it, needing starch than cotton, and that came into holes as she worked it. In such condition she took the clothes when completed to her employer, who obliged her to take them home and mend them. She darned each hole in her fashion, then came again, essaying to return the work and get her wages. "But he say he won't pay, Missus," she complained, "he say I got to pay him for the cotton, and take the things an' do the best I can with 'em. Do you think I ought to take 'em, Missus?" She was advised that there was no such obligation encumbering her, and, the matter coming to a crisis, suit was brought and her rights obtained.

The most frequent of complaints, perhaps, are those against rich ladies who won't pay, and well-to-do manufacturers ingenious in devices of trouble to employes.

As one flagrant example of the latter class of enormities, attention may justly be called to the case of girl employes, who leave a poorly-paying situation for one where better wages can be obtained, where they engage to do "piece work." This is recognized everywhere as perfectly legitimate, when they engage to work by the week. The engagement must be worked out. However, employers, many of them, will take the advantage of such a move as indicated whenever they can, often refusing to pay the girls when they leave on one pretext or another, and following this up by contesting their wages entirely in the end, saying, "Such or such an one left my service, and so forfeited her wages." Unless legal action is taken, too, the laborer generally has to abide by the iniquitous judgment so passed upon her.

A bonnet-frame manufacturer in Canal-street so sent a lot of poor young girls adrift upon the town, and these finally recovered their dues. Not so the number of employes, thirteen young women, who applied to collect their wages of a laundry establishment in First-street, closed up by the Sheriff, of which one partner (denying himself to be such) retired a man of means.

Yet another abuse is instanced in the case of Mrs. ——, a widow, whose son, her support, was killed in the late war. She was engaged in shirt making, receiving from 75 cents to $1 per dozen. She went one day to draw her pay and was confronted with the accusation that there were one dozen shirts she had never accounted for.

She remonstrated, explained—stated when they were returned, and how—all was of no avail. In her despair she summoned the expressman who, it chanced, had taken the parcel for her. She called to him as he had said. It was no avail, the proprietors (in Leonard-street this was) were obdurate.

A lawyer was employed to wait on the firm and threaten legal measures, the result of which was Mrs. —— was sent for to come and receive her money, then amounting to $12.

Cases on cases so multiply of proficients in the "fine art" of Cain, that it is difficult for the reporter to select, to stop or to go on.

A few more instances at random—well-authenticated as the others preceding them, and the space allotted us will bring us to a limit per force.

That, then, of a worthy German woman in First-avenue, who does exquisite work in silk embroidery upon merino and sack materials, who is her own designer also, and who receives the munificent sum of fourteen cents a piece for the crowns of infants' caps, or more properly, bonnets.

One of the firm by which she was employed, she said, "Use de baddest words to her she ever hear in her life. She could not tell how a young man use sick a words to an old woman."

All this was because they had given her the floss silk—what they thought enough to complete the job meted out to her—which proved not the half of what was required. They accused of dishonesty and swore that their work should be finished and she should furnish the floss if more was needed. This she could not do and a lawyer finally had to adjust it—in her favor.

Over the little episode of a furnishing man in one of the avenues, who engaged a lot of girls to sew for him upon the vague and inexplicit terms, "a fair price," contended when the day of reckoning came that he would only give them ten cents apiece for each linen coat, we pass (not because the sewing business and its wondrous revelations is exhausted) to a case in another direction that came up before us yesterday.

It was that of a middle-aged woman, a cook, who appeared where we were, crying and in great distress.

Her employers had sent her off the night before, not allowing her time to dry her clothes which she had washed, but forcing her to take them along wet in a bundle, and this, forsooth, because she had refused to receive her month's wages on their terms.

A gilt and white china dish had been broken by setting on ice. The mistress of the house had directed that her dinner custard should be put to cool. "She didn't particularly say 'put it on ice,'" said the woman, "but I thought it best, and lo! when I went to get it out the dish was broke half in two." The result was they deducted $12 50 from the $16 due her, as compensation, summing the policeman to take her to the Station House if she did not agree to go quietly away.

Says the German bard:

"Men must work and women must weep,
There's little to earn and many to keep."

Yet, while the latter apothegm holds its own ever, it may be determined by the above recorded experiences that there is no distinct apportionment of destinies such as the first line of the couplet indicates.

COMMUNICATIONS.

The First Fruits of Prohibition.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Your leading article last Tuesday contains a frightful but not exaggerated picture of the dangers impending over life and property in New-York, in consequence of the new "Democratic" charter. It seems to me that the first question naturally coming up in connection with these terrible probabilities is this: Through whose fault have the Democrats obtained the opportunity of working all this ruin and mischief? How did we lose our majority?

To answer this question fully would require much time and space, for there are doubtless several classes who must share the responsibility in different proportions. But there is one class of persons who do not hesitate to accept for themselves a large portion of it. I mean those gentlemen whose names and speeches appear almost every day in your columns in connection with what are called, by a bitter irony, temperance meetings, where they dilate on the wickedness of an occasional pint of beer or wine. These aquarian individuals, having nibbled away our majority, year after year, by alienating our German population, finished the business last Autumn by letting the election go by default, so far as they were concerned, in the rural districts, because, forsooth, the Republicans had nominated a German who drank beer for one of the State offices! They confess it—confess? They glory in it. I trust you have not forgotten "Prohibition's" boast in your columns last November, or my indignant comment on it; it is only to be regretted that more Republicans did not come forward to stigmatize his letter in proper terms.

One would fain hope that these were trying to make themselves out worse than they really are, and that the true cause of the Democratic success was the huge and hyper-Democratic multiplication of fraudulent votes in the City. But, unfortunately, excess of Democratic votes in one place does not explain deficiency of Republican votes in another, and I fear we must believe the confitentes reos who parade their guilt so impudently before us. Well, they have done their work! I hope it suits them. If it does not, their repentance will be of small profit; it is now too late to undo the mischief. But I trust the Republicans of other States, and especially of Massachusetts, will take warning from the example of these unlucky ascetics, who, all for the greater glory of God, and the annihilation of alcohol, have given over the great City and State of New-York as a prey to the drunkards of Tammany. Ticket Speculation at the Theatres.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

My experience as a regular theatre goer goes far to prove the fact that the managers of some theatres and the speculators are in collusion. I have applied at Niblo's on the evening of a performance, and been informed that all seats were gone. On applying to the speculators I have received tickets of admission and detached checks for reserved seats; have had my choice but of a very few seats. Under such circumstances I and one speculator who is always to be found there why this was done sometimes. He told me that the managers did it to secure the speculators from being "stuck" for more than the extra charge for reserved seats, the benefit of admission being good for other nights. My surprise has been slightly increased to find the theatre only partly filled during the evening, showing that the managers only care to sell the house, as they term it, and leave the speculators to sell the public. A PLAY GOER.

NEW-YORK, Friday, Feb. 11.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

You stated in your paper of this morning that the treasurer of Niblo's writes that they do not receive a single cent from ticket speculators beyond the regular advertised price. Now if he will inform me in which paper the regular advertised price is published, he will greatly oblige. A few evenings ago I paid $2 each for two seats in the parquet which were purchased at the ticket office, and at all the other theatres in the City charge $1 50 for seats in the same part of the house, had I not every reason to suppose I had been imposed upon?

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

NEW-YORK, Saturday, Feb. 12, 1870.

Line and Staff in the Navy—The Discipline of the Service.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

I have reason to congratulate myself on the favorable notice made by you on my communication on "Staff and Line," published in your edition of 21st ult.

To the general reader, or to any one in fact who is not familiar with the practical working of such authority as this which is now demanded, it may seem to be a most natural and rational demand, that a Surgeon, for example, should have authority over all those who are subordinate to him in his practice, but the practical working of such authority is fraught with inextricable confusion and with inevitable collisions.

Confining myself to the corps to which I have already alluded, there is a case on record where the literal practical working of the system as now proposed led not only to a collision in the assumed authority of the Surgeon and that of the Captain, but to a collision between the Surgeon and one of his assistants, making confusion worse confounded. The Surgeon of one of our vessels-of-war, being in the enjoyment of high rank and having subordinate to him two assistants, excused himself from daily attendance in the sick bay, and delegated the duty of prescribing for the sick to his two assistants, directing that they should alternate the duties of prescribing and keeping the record. The senior assistant prescribed on the first day while the junior assistant made the records in the journal; on the second day the junior assistant prescribed but the senior assistant refused to keep the journal, claiming that his rank entitled him to prescribe, or at least to be excused from serving while his junior was exercising the more important function in his office. Here was a collision at once! But this was but the beginning of the trouble. The Surgeon was appealed to, and he, conceiving himself to be possessed of this positive rank now demanded to be conferred by law, directed the senior assistant to consider himself suspended from duty, thereby assuming the prerogative of command, although only in his own so-called department. The senior assistant demurred, and finally refused to consider himself as suspended until such sentence should be passed upon him by the Captain of the ship, whom he then chose to recognize as the only person possessing real authority. The result may be readily conceived; the Surgeon was informed of his inability to exercise authority; but this instance may help to illustrate the worse than absurdity of investing civil officers with positive rank.

An assimilated rank has been conceded by the sea officers to the civil officers, and as long as it was confined to such rank as they now hold it has been found to work for the harmony of the service. The undue rank, granted by late regulation, has impaired discipline to an alarming extent. The question is now how can this matter, which is such a drag on the service, be reconciled. In your editorial, before referred to, you declare that your desire is essentially to see the whole subject established on a fair basis, and you deprecate the effort to impair discipline.

Let me then call your attention to the bill of Hon. Mr. ROBESON, lately presented in the House by the Chairman of the Naval Committee, and to urge upon the TIMES the acceptance of it as a basis on which this wished-for compromise may be established. The bill that Mr. ROBESON has sent to the Committee, he, in deference to the judgment of Congress, desires to be understood as suggestions to be modified according to its pleasure, but the bill contains in it the germ of discipline, and could never have been drawn up, even as suggestions, unless its author had mastered the main points of the subject at issue.

The conclusions that the honorable Secretary of the Navy has arrived at, though so short a time in office, prove that his view of the service is from a high standpoint, and that he is not to be swayed by personal considerations when they conflict with the true interests of the whole service. In his own language we have the matter of rank most ably treated. He says: "In the line of the navy high rank is a necessary incident of command, and it is essential to organization and discipline; but in the auxiliary corps it is a matter of personal feeling, dignity and comfort; and these, though considerations of importance, should, in common with all others that are personal, yield to the best interests of the service and of the country."

In order to give shape to these most correct ideas, he has so drawn his bill as to confer high assimilated rank on officers of the "auxiliary corps" who will not be required to serve afloat, thus avoiding the chance of collisions on board ship, arising from their undueas similated rank; while, at the same time, he has so limited the numbers of these corps thus advanced as not to exceed the probable requirements of the service on shore. No wiser plan could be suggested than this; it concedes much to the auxiliary corps, but in its practical working will not impair efficiency; it is most liberal in its provisions, providing amply for all the wants of the service, but keeping in view, the while, the necessary requirements of discipline. The bill is more liberal than the one introduced by Senator GRIMES, which passed the Senate at the last session of Congress, but, in so far as the assignment of rank and regulation of numbers is concerned, the bill of the present Secretary of the Navy confers nothing that the line officers are not willing to concede. In the drawing up of a final bill some modifications might be considered judicious, but as a basis on which a lasting adjustment of this vexed question may be established, may we not look for an indorsement of this bill from the TIMES? A LINE OFFICER.

The Reclamation of Stolen Goods.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

In your strictures on crime, one thing is lost sight of—the difficulty of reclaiming stolen property, even peculiarly valueless. The only choice is expensive advertising or watching pawnbrokers' offices. The former alternative generally produces no results, unless the reward is sufficiently excessive; the latter is met with opposition, negative it is true, but strong enough to convince the most impartial that some pawnbrokers expect their largest profits from stolen goods. In these days of thieves' saturnalia, cannot some supervision be exercised over these institutions, which, however necessary to the deserving poor, need not be the abbettors of theft and possibly even murder? I suppose that to insist on an examination of a pawnbroker's stock after a full description of the article sought, (which I have fairly tried, without succeeding, except in one case,) would require a search warrant, and it is impossible to supply the requisite affidavit. Conscientiously they know their position; an inquiry is usually met with an incredulous sneer, and, perhaps, an insinuation that your motives are dishonest. Put these offices under the supervision of somebody, make them publish a monthly report of portable articles pled

NEWS OF THE DAY.

EUROPE.

Thirty-five persons were arrested on Friday and a number yesterday in Paris, supposed to be implicated in a plot against the life of the Emperor. In all cases arms were found upon the persons of the prisoners. The story of the plot is discredited in London.

Seven of the editors of the Paris Reforme have been ordered to appear before the Court for a violation of the Press laws. In reply to the summons the paper yesterday published an article of "extraordinary violence" against the Government.

The reported appointment of M. PARADOL as the French Minister to Washington arose from the fact of his intended visit to America as a public reader, in which event he designs to visit the national capital.

In the Spanish Cortes at Madrid yesterday, Senor RIVERO stated, in reply to a question, that the Government was fully aware of a Carlist conspiracy and of its plans, but would do nothing until an actual outbreak, which, he added, it would be found abundantly able to crush.

The Bavarian Council has under consideration the question of the dethronement of the King.

Count BISMARCK closed the sessions of the Prussian Diet yesterday with a speech, in which he said that "he regretted the spirit of opposition that had been shown in the upper Chamber." He made no allusion to foreign affairs.

Considerable anxiety is reported in Constantinople owing to intrigues carried on by the Servians and Montenegrins.

The great rock near Ismalia has been removed successfully from the bed of the Suez Canal, making the minimum depth of the water, it is said, twenty-nine feet.

The agrarian outrages in Ireland still continue. A landlord of Kerry County was fired at yesterday through a window while sitting in his house.

The weather throughout Europe yesterday was intensely cold. At Paris the thermometer was thirty degrees below the freezing point. The Elbe was closed to navigation, and the Thames was filled with ice. A Valencia dispatch states that a snow storm prevailing was interrupting the communication eastward.

A match game of billiards, 1,200 points up, was played in London on Friday night, between ROBERTS, the English champion, and Mr. COOK, for the champion gold cup and £200 a side. The game was won by COOK by 117 points. The Prince of WALES and a large number of the nobility were present, and witnessed the game.

CONGRESS.

In the House yesterday, after the presentation of several petitions and the introduction of a number of bills and resolutions of no general interest, the Legislative Appropriation bill was taken up, and the discussion resumed in Committee of the Whole. The amendment to strike out the appropriation for reporters of the Globe was rejected, only three members voting for it. An amendment cutting down the item for printing from $500,000 to $50,000 was also rejected after a prolonged debate. The item in regard to the Congressional Library occasioned some discussion, Mr. WOOD charging that improper books were admitted to its shelves. At 4 P. M. the Committee rose, having disposed of about one-fifth of the bill, and immediately afterwards adjourned. The Senate was not in session.

STATE LEGISLATURE.

The Assembly only was in session yesterday, the Senate having adjourned on Friday until Monday. A statement of the pardons granted during the year was received from the Governor. The following bills were introduced: To increase the capital stock of the Hercules Life Insurance Company; amending the act making appropriations to the Brooklyn Dispensaries, and to charter the Fifth-Avenue Savings Bank of this City. A resolution of inquiry in regard to the alleged outrages on the ship Neptune was tabled. In Committee of the Whole the following bills were ordered to a third reading: Providing for the sale or lease of the Sailors' Snug Harbor on Staten Island; in regard to the Court of Special Sessions of New-York City and County, and to amend the act in relation to preferred cases in the Court of Appeals and Supreme Court. The Assembly then adjourned till Monday.

GENERAL.

An incendiary fire in Stafford, Conn., on Friday night, destroyed the Stafford Loom Works and the spool cotton manufactory of JOHNSON & WEBDEN. Loss, $34,000; insurance, $18,000.

The ice crop of the Hudson River for this year is pronounced by old ice men a total failure; and the large companies have begun stocking their houses from ice a foot thick cut at Whitehall in this State.

The bill granting suffrage to the women of Utah has passed both Houses of the Mormon Legislature and the Council and received the signature of Acting Governor MANN

The assassin of ISAAC GRUNWALDTH was arrested in Havana on Friday night. He is a native of the Canary Islands and a Sergeant in the volunteer force. He is to be Court-martialed, it is said, immediately.

It is reported that the City of San Miguel, in Cuba, is now occupied by Government troops, and families from the insurrectionary districts are said to be settling in the town.

In the Winnepeg New Nation of Jan. 28 it is stated that at the Red River Convention held at Winnepeg on the 25th ult., it was decided, after a three days' session, to draw up a list of the rights demanded by the people and to submit it to the Canadian Government as a basis of becoming a part of the Dominion.

The official Gazette of yesterday, published at Ottawa, Ont., contains a proclamation that after April 15 American silver will pass current in the Dominion at a discount of 20 per cent.

The Ministry of Newfoundland, according to dispatches from St. John, has resigned, and CHARLES FOX BENNET has been called upon to form a new Government.

The State constabulary force of Massachusetts, by an edict of the Legislature, has been reduced from 150 to 63 men.

A clerk in the employ of MANING, HOWLAND & Co., in Boston, was knocked down yesterday noon in the vestibule of the First National Bank, in State-street, and robbed of $2,700. An alarm was raised, and the thief was captured by a teamster. He gave his name as REED. The money was found on his person.

Owing to the ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury, that land grants by the Government must be located on air lines unless natural barriers intervene, surveys on the Northern Pacific Railway have been stopped until further orders.

Spring's Hotel and several other buildings in Cobden, Ill., were destroyed by fire on Thursday night; loss, $30,000; insurance, $12,000.

Fixedness of the Tariff Essential to the Prosperity of Trade.

The Connecticut Republicans, in the resolutions adopted at their recent Convention, ask for a tariff "abundant for revenue and as far as possible so devised as to relieve labor, equalize the burdens imposed, encourage a diversified industry, and avoid strengthening monopolies;" and they deprecate frequent changes in tariff legislation as "deranging the calculations of capital and inflicting unforeseen suffering on labor."

Now, there is a good deal of the vagueness and mistiness in this, which marks all party platforms. In this species of composition, clearness and precision are positive vices, because a great many shades of opinion have to be satisfied, and a good many inquisitive and cantankerous people deprived of the materials for grumbling; but then the meaning of it all, to anybody who is used to platforms, is plain enough. The Connecticut Republicans, and we believe the great body of Republicans all over the country share their feelings, want the tariff, whatever be its character, arranged on some principle or other, and then let alone. It is impossible that any industry so largely protected against foreign competition as ours is, should not suffer horribly under the ever-varying system which has been pursued during the last ten years, and ours has suffered.

When the tariff was first in process of construction, in 1861-2, it was perhaps difficult to avoid being very tentative, owing both to the tremendous demands made on the Treasury by the war, and the necessary ignorance from which everybody suffered at that moment as to what the country could bear, or any form of taxation would produce. What the country did bear was amazing. As much as fifty per cent., to take effect immediately, was more than once clapped on to goods, in a single day, to the ruin of persons who had already sent orders to Europe, and the enormous gain of persons who had stocks on hand. But in those days, when the war was costing two millions a day, and every morning paper had its tale of slaughter, the sorrows of the business community, arising out of Congressional experiments on the tariff, would have excited little commiseration even if anybody had taken the trouble to express them.

But as five years have elapsed since the war; as there has been in that interval abundant opportunity both of testing the endurance of the country in the matter of taxation, and of ascertaining the effects of taxation on industry; as, too, the whole subject has been carefully studied by a competent Government officer, and his reports produced through four successive years are in everybody's hands, all excuse for further tinkering of the tariff is gone. Besides, the country will not stand it any longer. Be the tariff high or low, all classes and conditions demand that it be fixed and let alone, so that business men may know what to count on, not only to-morrow and the day after, but next month and next year, in making their calculations. Certainty, even more than competition, is the life of trade. Without certainty, no great investments of capital, and especially in buildings and machinery, are safe, because all such investments take a long period to become productive.

Not only does the tariff tinkering infuse uncertainty into business, and thus tend to paralyze industry, but it infuses a spirit of gambling through the community, in many of its aspects almost as bad as Government lotteries. It teaches large numbers of traders and manufacturers to look to other modes of making profits and getting out of scrapes, than economy and industry, and energy, and, most of all, to lobbying at Washington. If men can only get the ear of the Committee of Ways and Means, they may add twenty per cent. to the value of their stock or may ruin a rival enterprise. The process by which the Whisky Ring for several years made their profits is one which is going on with more or less activity, though in a disguised form, in various branches of manufacture. The country insists that whatever the tariff be, it be a tariff to which industry can adapt itself.

Democracy and Excise—The Struggle at Albany.

The Excise troubles of the New-York Democracy have but just begun. Fortune favored them in the political hazard of November last; but they drew an elephant in their lottery, and the question now is how to dispose of him. The flourish of trumpets with which the Democracy entered on their successful struggle, inviting the German population, as they did, to enlist under their standard, now dies away to a very faint tooting when it comes to "redemption of pledges" in actual legislation. Beheralded with such a fanfaronade, surely something more was expected by those who temporarily passed over to the hostile standards on this single issue than that which Mr. FREAR'S proposed charter furnishes. This last simply opens liquor saloons one hour more in the twenty-four, namely, from 12 to 1 o'clock at night—a pitiful "concession" to good citizens, whether German or others, since it is well known that those "sober, temperate and law-abiding citizens," for whom Governor HOFFMAN pleaded in his Message, are by no means troubled at the lack of 1 o'clock carousals in public. If it be a concession to anybody—and the matter is a slight one, unless the entire liquor-shop restriction at night be removed,—it is to that class of the community whose hideous crimes so often date from the revels of these hours.

So, again, the proposed Tammany charter, instead of allowing lager-beer to be freely sold on Sundays, as was promised, directly limits the privilege to the "beer gardens"—forming not a hundredth part of the places which sought relief from the present Excise law. And even here the provision was specially limited to a portion of the gardens, as will appear from an examination of section 113 of the new charter, which, after prescribing that all places in which liquor is sold shall be kept closed between 1 and 4 o'clock A. M. every day, and on Sundays and election days, makes the following exception:

"And nothing in this article contained shall be so construed as to restrict the proprietor or keeper of gardens in which lager beer shall be kept from selling lager beer, when such garden is situated at least a quarter of a mile from any place of public worship, and the keeper thereof has been duly licensed."

That there may be no escape from the provisions of the law, it is specially provided that the word "liquor," throughout the charter, shall embrace also "ales, malt beer and lager beer." Nor has the charter even overthrown the Excise law, still less the excise principle. On the contrary, it establishes three Excise Commissioners; it retains the minimum license of $30 fixed in the Metropolitan act of 1836; it retains the five-gallon clause, the prohibition of selling without authority to persons under 18 years of age, and the fines for non-license, while the Police force are directed, in case of infractions of the law, to "make as soon as possible the proper complaint to the Board of Excise." In fine, the greater part of the Metropolitan Excise law has been substantially retained in the new charter, with slight changes of phraseology and a slight "letting down the bars." We do not complain of this fact. On the contrary, we feel that it vindicates the claim of the Republican Party that it had desired to make a good law, and would most gladly modify it in any reasonable and proper way demanded by "sober, temperate, and law-abiding citizens." But the case is otherwise with the Democracy, who are so badly trimming and dodging on this question. They are going far enough to disgust one part of the community, and yet not far enough to save themselves from a breach of implied faith with those who were tricked into being their supporters.

Turning now from the Tammany charter, we are prepared to review the desperate efforts to patch up a suitable liquor legislation in the Senate. On Thursday, the special order was the bill to repeal the Metropolitan Excise law, for which Mr. NORTON has offered a substitute, extending a form of Excise law all over the State. Now, to begin with, how the extension of an Excise law becomes the remedy for existing grievances on the subject does not appear, unless it may be learned by a study of the fable of the fox, who, having irretrievably lost his own tail in a trap, proposed that all his brother foxes should lose theirs. We must not be understood as implying that an Excise law should not be extended through the State; on the contrary, there may be good reasons for some such measure. All we mean to say is that this sort of action is not what the deceived allies of the Democracy were led to expect. It only shows how, now that the elephant has been drawn, he is troublesome to dispose of. In other words, the Democracy find precisely the same difficulty the Republicans encountered—a difficulty set forth in Governor HOFFMAN'S Message as that of an attempt to—

"regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors under due restrictions as to time and place, aiming to secure order and decorum on every day of the week, fully recognizing the general sentiment prevailing in favor of a proper observance of Sunday, (as has always been done in the statutes of the State from the earliest period of its history,) yet free from intolerant provisions."

The difference is that the Republicans held this decorous language and moderate desire throughout the canvass, while some of their opponents promised what they could not perform, and ought not to perform.

However, the Governor disclosed the policy his party in the Legislature were disposed to adopt, and it proved to consist of two features. Of these the first was the restoration of "private rights," and the "abrogation of the degrading system of Police espionage," while the second was the extension of the excise system through the State. As to the first feature, we have already shown that the Tammany Ring found it impossible or unwise to do away, in their own new charter, with any of the important "invasions of private right" so loudly complained of, while section 116 of that charter directly establishes "Police espionage," by declaring that "it shall be the especial duty of the Police to complain to the Board of Excise of every person amenable to the penalties aforesaid," namely, for "neglecting or refusing to keep his place closed at night, or on Sundays or election days."

On the other hand, so far as concerns the extension of the excise system through the State, we do not see how that helps the matter in this City. A good law for that purpose would not probably be objected to; but when we find Mr. MURPHY'S bill for this purpose declaring that "so much of the last-mentioned act [i. e., the Metropolitan] as makes intoxication an offence, punishable by fine and imprisonment, is hereby abrogated and annulled," we are glad to note that the Republican vote was thrown solidly against this extraordinary provision, even though a solid Democratic majority the other way rendered their action little more than a protest. We may take it for granted that while the Republican Party respects "the social customs of large numbers of sober, temperate, law-abiding citizens, whose enjoyment of such customs does not prejudice general morals or public order," it does not sanction, nor does it believe such citizens sanction, an implied declaration in the laws of the land that intoxication is not a punishable offence.

For the rest, the Senate adopted an amendment "remedying" some of the new charter stringencies, already spoken of. That is to say, instead of limiting the sale of Sunday beer to gardens, they declared it should be sold "in any public garden or other licensed place not in public view," while the quarter-mile provision of the charter was not introduced, so that a beer garden may be in full blast beside a church. As a sop for the other side, the night-closing hours, instead of extending only from 1 to 4 A. M., as Mr. FREAR proposes, extend in the Senate bill from 1 to 5. We shall, of course, hear more of this matter before the bill becomes a law; but we think it already sufficiently evident that the Democracy have displeased one part of the community and disappointed the other. It is welcome to its elephant.

Billiards in England and America.

In the midst of some very unpleasant political and social troubles, England has found time to get into a whirl of excitement over a game at billiards. The Prince of WALES was pleased to look on at the match, and a "very large number of the nobility" was also attracted to the scene. The players were Mr. JOHN ROBERTS, who visited this country not long ago, and a comparatively new contestant for honors—Mr. W. COOK. Within the last few months great stories of Mr. COOK'S prowess have been ringing in the ears of the British public, and have even made their way into billiard circles in this country. Hitherto Mr. ROBERTS has been champion, but his honors were threatened by the bold COOK, and at last an open challenge was sent. To settle that the match of Friday evening was played, while England held her breath, and long messages respecting the players were transmitted through the cable. The event, if it does not shake the spheres, may be allowed to occupy five minutes of our readers' time.

Everybody knows that in England the game of billiards is played with three balls, and that the table has six pockets. There is great delicacy and science in "going in off" these balls, as well as in putting the red, or object ball, into the pocket. The spot at the upper end of the table is a little further from the cushion than on American tables, and Mr. ROBERTS' great stroke is to keep on pocketing the red from this spot. He has been known to do it 115 times in succession—thus scoring 345 without at all varying his stroke. That was the way in which he won so many matches.

But, of course, this was not billiards. It was simply a sort of trick, and it greatly detracted from the beauty and science of the game. It was recently resolved to give the death blow to the "spot stroke" by moving the spot closer to the cushion, and forbidding it altogether in great matches. Upon these terms Mr. ROBERTS met Mr. COOK on Friday evening. It should be stated that the younger player had himself attained to wonderful perfection in the spot stroke, insomuch that he could beat Mr. ROBERTS himself at it. Yet both agreed to "bar" it in the recent match. The result was that the great Mr. ROBERTS was beaten. The game was 1,200, and Mr. COOK won by 117 points. The stakes were the champion's gold cup and £200 a side. Mr. COOK is now the envy of every professional player in England—and there the genus is very plentiful all over the land.

This contest will confirm American players in the opinion they have so long held, that the game usually played here is better than the English game. Four pockets are quite enough on a table, and "losing hazards" are certainly easier than the general run of carroms. As for the "winning hazard"—i. e., pocketing a ball—we retain that, while not making it the chief feature of the game. It undoubtedly lends variety, and even brilliancy, to the play. Many people, however, prefer the simple French "carrom" game and there can be no question that it develops great precision of stroke and accuracy of eye. In one shape or another, billiards is a game well worth introducing into the household more than is commonly done. For girls it is a splendid exercise—it makes them use their arms, it expands the chest, and obliges them to do more walking than they might be disposed to undertake without some provocation. Young ladies ought to accustom themselves to play with the ordinary cue, and not with the mace. The latter device is fit only for children. A table in the house is always a great source of enjoyment, to young and old. It is much better for ladies and gentlemen to join together in a game at "pool" after dinner, than for the gentlemen to sit discussing politics in the dining room, while the ladies are left to amuse themselves as they can in the drawing room. A table with pockets is preferable for the house, if only because a party of ladies can play upon it at any time. As a means of innocent and healthy recreation, there is no indoor game at all equal to billiards. It is for the evening what croquet is for the daytime, and the busiest man or woman is the better for taking a reasonable degree of interest in both pastimes.

Reconstruction—Land Ahead.

No American citizen, native or adopted, who values the honor and welfare of the Great Republic, can view with other feelings than those of heartfelt satisfaction the gradual solution of the difficult problem of Reconstruction. It was not to be expected, after the terrible experiences of such a war as that which convulsed the Union during four years, that the cessation of hostilities should be followed immediately by the full sunshine of peace. In the Northern and Western States, indeed, which escaped comparatively unscathed, it is perhaps no marvel that so few traces remain of the stern and sanguinary struggle. But all through that sunny South, where war's desolating blast swept with such terrific violence, where the entire social system underwent so radical a change, it might well be thought that years and years must pass before the public could once more enjoy the blessings of peace, appreciate the benefits of law and order, and frankly acknowledge the boon of liberty and Union. Nor, indeed, if we listened only to the ravings out of that extreme partisan Press, whose main object seems to be to feed and perpetuate the passions and prejudices engendered by the fierce conflict, could we well persuade ourselves that any portion of the South had yet fairly begun to feel the happy influences of Reconstruction.

Such, nevertheless, is the undoubted fact. The South is recovering, and with marvelous rapidity, too, from the effects of the most terrific war that ever laid waste a country. And the South has but to accept the teachings of its own wisest and most unselfish statesmen, to follow the counsels of its most sincere and earnest well-wishers among the people and Press of the North, to insure for itself a career of prosperity hitherto unexampled. It may possibly be thought that the promptings of hope, no less than our interest in the success of Republican policy, have led us to draw a brighter future for the South than the facts themselves will justify. Let us cite a witness, then, whose testimony will not be disputed on either side; who cannot well be suspected of a disposition to exaggerate the promising state of affairs at the South, and who certainly will not be charged with any undue partiality for the Republican policy or party. We refer to the Journal of Commerce, which publishes a letter from a Texas correspondent, under date of Houston, January, 1870, containing these, among other suggestive statements:

"Never did New Year's dawn upon Texas in a more promising condition than on the 1st of January, 1870. An abundant yield of the various products of our soil, for which remunerative prices have been realized, has caused money to be plentiful and times easy. Out of debt, with a surplus in our State treasury of near $300,000, our financial condition is eminently satisfactory. * * The immigration, during the Winter has been unprecedented—coming from almost every State in the Union, and from many foreign countries. Many of these emigrants bring with them capital, character and enterprise. Among all who come to cast in their lots with us, none are more heartily welcome than Yankees. * * Recently we have received our first installment of Chinese immigrants, numbering about two hundred and fifty, designed for laborers on the Texas Central Railroad. They have, from both Press and people, met with a cordial reception. The need of their labor is generally felt and acknowledged. It is the unanimous testimony from all sources that the freed people of our State have, during 1869, labored more cheerfully and industriously, and behaved themselves with more general propriety, than ever before. They have generally entered into contracts mutually satisfactory for another year."

Here is a pleasing picture, indeed, and one, too, drawn from life. What have our Democratic friends to say to the startling tidings herein communicated? The much-maligned "Yankee," the embodiment of all that is objectionable in Puritanism, Radicalism and Republicanism, made "heartily welcome" in an ultra Southern State. The hard-working, but, unhappily, copper-colored Chinese, whom the liberal and enlightened Democracy of California proscribe as Pariahs, meeting with a "cordial reception" at the hands of the Southern chivalry. Above all, the enfranchised negro, that special object of Democratic prejudice and aversion, now made a participator in that "white man's government," and, conscious of his increased responsibility, rising with his new dignity, acknowledged on all hands to be laboring "more cheerfully and industriously," and behaving with more general propriety than ever before! What wonder that with such a condition of affairs the New Year should dawn so brightly upon the "Lone Star State!" And what encouragement, in the results already accomplished, for the Republican Party, upon whom so heavy a responsibility is devolved, to persevere in the good work of reconstruction on the broad basis of amnesty and suffrage.

The Line and Staff Dispute.

It will be a happy day, not for our navy only, but for the country, when the long and bitter quarrel between line and staff is settled by appropriate and just legislation. The last Washington tidings of any importance represented that a basis had been agreed upon whereby the staff should receive positive instead of assimilative rank, while the several grades themselves had not been settled. Of course this would be substantially a staff triumph on the key-point of the dispute. However, this news is unofficial. For ourselves, we have held uniformly that while the staff extremists were preposterous in their demands, there was yet a justice so palpable in their cause as a whole, and a humiliation so grievous in the snubbing they now receive, that they would certainly carry some of their points. We have therefore urged the line not to oppose a liberal concession of such rank and rights as would be wrung from them sooner or later.

Pending the final settlement, we publish to-day, in another column, an able and temperate letter on the "Discipline of the Service." In this letter the suggestions for a bill which have come from the Naval Bureau are ably defended, and are declared satisfactory to the line. It will be observed, however, that they do not concede positive rank to the "auxiliary corps," and aim rather to avoid concession than to make it.

Inviting attention to these suggestions of Mr. ROBESON, and leaving the illustration of them with our correspondent, we next take up the special report of Surgeon WOOD, the Chief of Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, regarding the difficulty of officering the medical corps of the navy, with its causes and their remedy. We shall endeavor to put the point of this pamphlet in a nutshell. To begin with, the "difficulty" in question is assumed to be an admitted fact—though we believe it is doubted by some line disputants whether there be such a difficulty. Taking the fact for granted, the author pronounces its chief cause to be that the present "usages of the naval service and the want of proper legislation place medical men in the navy below the average respectability of the profession in civil life." This second point he also takes for granted, though we believe it also, is disputed by the line. The "remedy" he proposes is the "legislative enactment, known under the term of medical staff rank, when applied to medical men." Or, in other words, he demands that Surgeons and Assistant Surgeons shall no longer be "excluded from those routine honors which are secured to officers of the line, not as special distinction for special merit, but as a reward for the dangers which line and staff equally encounter, and as a testimony to the fidelity of service which both equally render."

It is proper to put these points clearly, in order that line officers may know why it is that people in general sympathize with the aims and aspirations of the auxiliary corps. The hostility which some of the latter have permitted themselves to indulge, in the heat of an angry dispute, against the line and the navy as a whole, is not shared by public-spirited citizens. But what we all demand is, that the staff, like the line, shall be able to secure for itself the best available talent in the country. If there are arbitrary and artificial distinctions which prevent us from getting that high order of professional ability in our navy which would be otherwise at our disposal, those distinctions must be abolished. We wish to make the medical service of the navy as honorable, respected, and every way enviable as it practically can be. Now, as we are bound to take the uniform testimony of the line as to their feelings and ambitions, so we are bound to take that of the Surgeons regarding theirs. High and uniform testimony from the latter that there is a difficulty in getting suitable medical officers for the navy, and that this difficulty results mainly from the want of proper treatment, must be accepted as the opinion of experts. And when the remedy appears to be simply the conferring of titles, honors, rank, ceremonious and respectful consideration, we cannot afford to let such slight matters impair the usefulness of the service.

How the Globe is Being Girdled.

We gave an outline the other day of the route by which it is proposed to conduct the new Pacific cable to the shores of Asia, and thus furnish the last link which will be required to complete the electric chain encircling the world. A writer in the London Times furnishes interesting details of the various projects which are being matured in order to extend existing European lines to the confines of China and Japan. Like our own engineers, the English projectors have given their preference to exclusively ocean lines of communication. The only Government interested in furthering the construction of land lines is the Russian. The exigencies of military occupation have already been the means of carrying a line to the frontier of Persia, a British continuation of which forms the existing European communication with India. Another Russian system, having a similar military origin, extends across Siberia and Tartary to Lake Baikal, whence it is conducted to Kiachta on the Chinese frontier, and by a service of mounted couriers, who perform the journey to Pekin in ten days, forms the quickest medium of intercourse of the Chinese with the Western world. The Russian Government has undertaken to extend its wires from Lake Baikal, across Eastern Siberia and Manchooria, to a place named Posietta, in the Japanese Sea. A supplementary scheme, proposed by a company nominally Danish, undertakes to connect Posietta by submarine cables with Japan, Shanghae and Hong Kong. The total length of the Russian land telegraph, from Libau, on the Baltic, to Posietta, will be about 7,300 miles.

The argument urged by the promoters of the British ocean lines is that a land system so vast in extent, erected for the most part in a sterile and inaccessible wilderness, but thinly studded with Russian military stations, and exposed to possible damage from tribes of wandering Tartars, fails to supply the desideratum of safe and uninterrupted international communication. Experience has proved that the land lines at present existing in Asia are subject to numerous inflictions of willful damage. The cotton holders of Bombay have before now been convicted of instructing agents at some remote district of Persia to cut the wires, in order to delay the transmission of news of a fall in the Indian market. They maintain, therefore, that submerged lines give the nearest approach that can be had to perfect inviolability. Even in time of war, no vessel could grapple and raise the cables without having, together with a knowledge of their exact position, an amount of cumbrous machinery which would make her an easy prey to hostile cruisers.

Including the three Atlantic cables, there is at present subscribed of French and English capital for purposes of ocean telegraphy a total of $34,625,000, gold, covering an aggregate distance of 20,961 miles, and, according to the stipulations of existing contracts, all to be completed before the end of 1871. The various branches of Asiatic extension are divided among six different companies: one to be carried from Falmouth to join the existing Mediterranean line from Malta to Alexandria, another to continue this from Suez to Bombay, another to resume the connection at Ceylon and carry it to Singapore, and still another to carry the same line to Hong Kong and Shanghae. A supplementary line passes from Singapore to Java and Port Darwin, in Australia.

From this extraordinary amount of activity in telegraph extension, it may be inferred that ocean cables pay. If we take the transatlantic lines now in operation as a criterion, the fact becomes very evident that they do. It is calculated that the average length of a commercial message is thirty words. Sixteen words per minute being the rate at which a message can be transmitted and received by skillful operators, thirty such messages can be sent in an hour. Allowing for the intervals between the conclusion of one message and the commencement of another, the working day may be reduced to twenty hours, in which, according to our calculation, 600 messages can be sent or received. At the present scale of charges made by the Atlantic Companies these 600 messages of thirty words each would yield a return of $13,500 gold, and allowing 300 working days in the year, a revenue of $4,050,000 is shown to be possible from a single cable. In point of fact, the shareholders of one of the existing companies have already had the entire amount of their original capital very nearly repaid to them. Such facts need no comment. They at once justify the soundness of the commercial policy which prompts the schemes already in progress, and they give the public sufficient right to expect that the influence of a healthy competition will by-and-by bring the facilities of interoceanic communication within the reach of all.

Uniform Naturalization Bill.

The bill reported by the House Judiciary Committee is intended to change radically the present system of naturalization, under which, owing to the varying laws and practice of the several States, there have been great confusion and opportunities for fraud.

Proceedings for naturalization must be taken before the United States Circuit or District Courts, or, where there are not more than two terms annually of these, before the United States Court of highest jurisdiction of the State. As a first step, the applicant must file with the Clerk of the Court a notice of intention to become a citizen, which notice shall state full particulars of birth, parentage, residence, arrival in the country, &c., and he must give the names of two citizens who know him personally. The notice is to be filed, but open for inspection or copying. After four years' subsequent continuous residence in the United States, he may apply to one of the Courts named for admission to citizenship, at least twenty days before the term or session thereof. He must have lived in the State for the previous six months, and in the district, county or parish in which the application is made, for thirty days. And he must produce one or more credible citizens who can testify to all the foregoing particulars, as also to his moral character and fitness generally for admission. Any citizen may produce opposing evidence. If the Court is satisfied in the applicant's favor, it will give him a certificate of naturalization, to take effect six months thereafter, and so stating. The clerk of the Court must, within sixty days after its rising, send abstracts of all cases to the United States Secretary of State's office, where they will be filed conveniently for reference. This clause has, however, been struck out by the House Judiciary Committee. Wives and minor children, if in the United States, are naturalized by these proceedings.

United States alien soldiers, discharged honorably from disability or expiration of term of service, only need reside one year, complying with the other requirements of the bill in each case. Persons convicted anywhere of an infamous crime are to be denied citizenship. False evidence or any counterfeiting, or aiding therein, or personation of others, is adjudged felony, involving hard-labor imprisonment from one to five years, or a fine of $100 to $1,000, or both. The use of a certificate fraudulently or improperly obtained under this or previous laws is punishable with the same fine, or not exceeding two years imprisonment, or both. If any United States District-Attorney is informed by affidavit, of any person of the existence within his district of any fraudulent State or United States certificate of naturalization, he shall apply for an order to the party holding it to appear before one of the Courts of that district after twenty days, and to produce the certificate, whereupon the District-Attorney may cause the party to be examined under oath; and the paper shall be condemned or affirmed, as the facts shall determine. If it be lost or destroyed, other evidence may be produced by the District-Attorney or the accused for or against the citizenship in question. But no such proceeding shall be taken within forty days of any general State or municipal election. Nor is evidence obtained therein to be used in any criminal prosecution except for forgery.

The alien may, after giving his notice of intention, file a copy of his declaration, duly certified by the clerk, with the United States Secretary of State, and is thereupon entitled to protection as a citizen while he resides within the United States. All previous naturalization laws are repealed, but pending prosecutions thereunder are not affected; and all rights which have accrued under such laws remain unaffected. United States citizens who have become naturalized in any foreign country may at any time renounce the latter allegiance, and be readmitted, under provisions set forth, to their original citizenship. The fees for the naturalization here of aliens are—for the notice of intention, 25 cents; for the record of judgment, $1; for the certificate, 25 cents; for the declaration for protection, $1, and for the resumption of allegiance, $3.

Revenue Problems in France.

The protracted discussion on the commercial treaties in the French Legislature has produced the usual amount of conflicting facts and irreconcilable theories which are so invariably associated with questions of national finance. The most careless perusal of the voluminous collection of special pleadings for and against the renewal of the treaties of commerce is sufficient to make one sensible of the danger of attaching too much importance to statistics when used to illustrate the operation of any single principle. The proverbial pliancy of figures has never been better illustrated than in the different purposes they have been made to serve in the recent conflict between the rival schools of French economists.

It would be difficult to find in any country of the world an abler expositor of the protectionist doctrines than M. THIERS. It is nearly forty years ago since the great Orleanist Minister first employed his cultured and persuasive eloquence in claiming the exclusion of foreign products in the interest of native industry. Since then his convictions have never wavered, and his advocacy never faltered in sustaining the contest against tariff reduction. His great speech of the 22d of January, which for three hours held captive the attention of an audience only partially friendly to its views, possessed all the old vivacity, and was constructed with all the consummate art so long displayed by the veteran orator. And yet, apart from its remarkable clearness of statement, there was little to distinguish it from what less eminent men had already advanced on the same subject. After recapitulating the causes which rendered the French manufacturer incapable of sustaining an equal contest against those of England, Belgium and Switzerland, and the necessity that existed for protecting the native wool grower against his more favored competitors in Australia and La Plata, M. THIERS proceeds to demonstrate that the true market of France is her domestic one. Other nations may share the advantages and the perils of the commerce of the world. France has a rôle more humble, though the author thinks not less glorious—the development of her internal resources. Had she won the battle of Trafalgar instead of losing it, the result might, he admits, have been different; but, as things have gone, the French nation must confine itself to the destiny which has been marked out for it.

The bulk of the French Press join issue with M. THIERS on his facts as well as his deductions from them, and utterly refuse to indorse his somewhat antiquated theory about dispensing with an export trade. Be it noted that the protection demanded for French industry is set down by M. THIERS at the moderate rate of 15@20 per cent. ad valorem. Theoretically the present duties amount to ten or fifteen per cent., but it is said that various mercantile devices which are in future to be prevented, reduce the tax to six or seven per cent. The point most conclusively demonstrated in the whole controversy is, that a reduction of internal burdens is quite as essential to commercial prosperity as abatement of Customs duties. Switzerland beats the French manufacturer partly because of her splendid natural water power, but mainly because her artisans pay only half the taxation inflicted on those of France, while England, in addition to the strength possessed by a highly developed industrial system of long standing, is not exposed to the disadvantage of having the flower of her male population drained for a few years period of military service. No principle has been more frequently enunciated during this discussion than this, that all liberties have a certain organic unity. France has sacrificed much by her neglect of this great principle, and she cannot too soon advance in that course of national enfranchisement, in which the institution of a properly graduated revenue system is but one step.

Gulf Stream Meteorology.

Few subjects have of late excited more attention from scientific men than the Gulf Stream and its effects on our meteorology. Last Winter in England was most remarkable for its verual and balmy mildness. But at the very season when the Gulf Stream was exerting the most unusual and paramount influence in mitigating the climate of the Isles, the Royal Geographical Society was debating whether there is in truth any Gulf Stream, or whether it is a myth. Facts, however, are stubborn things, and it would be hard for the Royal Society, by its unanimous verdict, to throw any suspicion over the existence or the potency of this great "river in the ocean."

The journal of the Scottish Meteorological Society, compiled from numberless observations, states that "one may travel from Land's End on the forty-eighth parallel of north latitude to John O'Groat's house, on the fifty-eighth parallel, without coming to a single place with an average temperature below 39°." Common sense would seem to demonstrate that, in a country as far north as Labrador, only by such an agency as the hot water of the great equatorial current could such a pleasant and salubrious climate be preserved. Ever since BENJAMIN FRANKLIN'S day it has been known that, but for this tide rolling its blue and smoking waters to Western Europe, the shores of that continent would be more or less icebound. St. John's Harbor, Nova Scotia, according to Colonel SABINE, has been locked in the grip of the Frost King as late in the year as June. But the harbor of Hammerfest, on the northern coast of Norway, and within the Arctic Circle, latitude 72°, has at no recorded time ever been closed to shipping. Only fourteen times in eight hundred years has the River Thames been frozen over. And, what is of equal significance, our highest geographical authorities tell us that our Western coast, bathed by the recurvation of the great equatorial current of the Pacific Ocean, strikingly resembles Northwestern Europe. Even Alaska, in nearly the same latitude with the British Islands, is clothed like Ireland, and by a similar agency, with a mantle of green.

Our experience here in New-York may be worth something. For many weeks we have been experiencing just such weather as our transatlantic friends had last year. Our prevailing winds for the Winter have always been from the land, and we have always shivered under them. During the genial spell we have been passing through, the winds have blown from the sea, with warm rains, and, according to the views of an eminent meteorologist, may be regarded as the upper or return current of the trade winds from the tropics.

The Students at Bellevue.

The sharp reprimand given to some of the medical students by Professor JAMES B. WOOD, President of the Bellevue Hospital College, a week ago, for disgraceful conduct towards the lady students, has had its good effect, for at yesterday afternoon's lecture the bearing of the class was all that could be desired, not the slightest disrespect being shown to the members of the weaker sex who were present.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

The Week's Amusements.

Five Italian operas have been sung in New-York during the past week—"Masaniello" on Monday, at the Academy; "Maria de Rohan," at the Union League Theatre, on Tuesday; "Linda" at the Academy, on Wednesday, and "Il Ballo in Maschera" and "Fra Diavolo" at the same house on Friday and Saturday. "Masaniello" has not proved so great a success as we hoped, although Signor LEFRANC sang his part extremely well. The opera requires for its full effect a Fenella of first-rate merit, a really good tenor for Alfonso, a practiced soprano for the Princess, and a mise en scene that it did not seem worth while to afford for this occasion at the Academy. "Maria de Rohan," at the pretty Jerome Theatre, was, as we have already recorded, a decided success. Signor RONCONI deserves unstinted praise for the energy and philanthropic feeling he display d in getting up this performance, no less than for the splendid ability of his acting in Chevreuse. To Mrs. LULAGER's merits as Maria we have already tried to do justice. We are glad to hear that the Samaritan Home for the Aged will benefit largely by this performance. The representation of "Linda" on Wednesday, at the Academy, was well attended and well received, but cannot be recorded as an unequivocal artistic success. Miss KELLOGG, who made her reëntre as the heroine, sang with even more than her usual excellence, but her support was, on the whole, weak, and in spite of the admirable acting of Signor RONCONI as Antonio the opera was not among the best rendered of the season. On Friday Dr. VALENTINE, an amateur, made his first appearance in public as Renato in "Il Ballo." The experiment was hardly justified by its results. Renato is one of the most difficult parts in the range, and it would be simply miraculous if a novice could give it anything like its proper dramatic effect, even were he capable of doing justice to its vocal requirements. The fatal blunder made by almost all tyros in art—that of thinking that what looks easy must be easy—has apparently not been escaped by Dr. VALENTINE. At times when he evidently thought he was on the same plane of intelligibility and general forcibleness with the artists around him he was merely inaudible; and his action, without being exactly either offensive or grotesque, was painfully tame and unequal to the needs of the situations. Dr. VALENTINE has a good voice and a good stage presence and may do great things yet; but he ought to understand that he has a vast deal to learn first, and that they are no true friends who would fain persuade him otherwise. Miss KELLOGG sang Zerlina charmingly, on Saturday, and delighted in the part an excellent house. "Rigoletto" is to be presented on Monday with Miss KELLOGG, RONCONI and LEFRANC in the chief parts, a cast from which we hazard little in augurring a very fine performance.....

"School" has been charmingly placed upon the stage at Wallack's and is drawing excellent houses, as a matter of course. There is a pastoral beauty about the scenes and a quiet realism about the acting of this comedy which make it singularly enjoyable and warrant all the lavish praise they have elicited. We like Mr. LESTER WALLACK better in Jack Poynts than in Chalcot, capital as was his performance of the latter character. Mr. GILBERT is wonderfully natural and lifelike as the Doctor; Mr. STODDARD, if a trifle exaggerated, very funny as Krux; Mr. FISHER carefully studied and appreciative of the scope for contrast in Farintosh, and Mr. MARLOWE easy and satisfactory in Lord Beaufoy. The ladies are no less acceptable, Miss MOORE as Bella and Miss GERMON as Naomi Tighe having made nice studies of their parts, with results that are always harmonious and interesting. "School" is without the military element of "Ours," and indeed is destitute of any sensational opportunities of any sort. It is, however, no less gratifying a performance for all that, and as it is thoroughly relished by the public it will doubtless remain on the bills for some time. Miss MADELINE HENRIQUES, having recovered from her late illness, was warmly welcomed last night on resuming her part of Lady Teasle; and the "School for Scandal" went off on the occasion with great spirit and applause. "Lost at Sea" is nearly ready, and we are told will eclipse all recent productions hereof in point of elaborate and costly scenic display....

Mr. FECHTER acts Halmet to-morrow night at Niblo's—his Lagadere having crowded that large theatre for three weeks past. It is almost impossible that the scenery and appointments at Niblo's—the piece being produced for six nights only—should compare other than unfavorably with the admirable setting of "Hamlet" at Booth's Theatre. But for this drawback the intelligent public will be thoroughly prepared, and will judge accordingly. Mr. FECHTER fought against and overcame greater obstacles of this sort in Ruy Blas than, from what we hear, he is likely to encounter in Hamlet. Whatever success he may gain in the latter character will be an artistic triumph, enhanced rather than diminished, by the comparative inadequacy of his surroundings. The house on Monday night, judging from present appearances, will be overwhelmingly great....After long preparation, the cheval de bataille of the Grand Opera House season was produced on Monday in the shape of the "Twelve Temptations." The piece is worthless in a literary sense, but it is undeniably well gotten up, and some of the scenes surpass for splendor the best of any similar spectacle yet seen in New-York. Every one should have a look at the "Twelve Temptations," if only to judge how far the march of improvement has carried the decoration of our modern stage. Perhaps scenery artistically finer, more spiritual in design and suggestion, might be conceived; but it is difficult to imagine anything more georgeously radiant than the "Transformation Scene" of this play, or, indeed, than one or two scenes that precede it.

Mr. FOX, too, acts Hamlet at the Olympic Theatre to-morrow evening. A "legion of prominent citizens" having addressed him on the subject requesting him to fill the part, Mr. FOX consented at once in a reply couched in the following terms:

"Hamlet. The body is with the King, but the King is not with the body. The King is a thing——

Guildenstern. A thing, my lord!

Hamlet. Of nothing: bring me to him. HIDE FOX, and all after. [Exeunt.

Not being at all inclined to be HIDE, notwithstanding my friend BOOTH's justly-famed impersonation, and masterly 'getting up' of SHAKESPEARE'S 'Hamlet' have rendered it a somewhat difficult task, I cannot but yield to your earnest desire to witness my attempt in the part of H. D. (Hamlet, Dane."

So "Hamlet"—Mr. T. C. DE LEON's version of the play, be it understood—will be performed to-morrow. The company has been strengthened for the occasion, and new scenery has been painted....The burlesque of "Faust" will be given at Wood's Museum until further notice.... At the Bowery Mr. J. B. STUDLEY will act as the star. He is to appear to-morrow in—"Hamlet!"

.....We observe that a complete change of performance will characterize to-morrow evening's entertainment at the New-York Circus. Miss LUCILLE WATSON is to reappear, with several prominent artistes, and many novel features will be introduced.

"THE PASSIONS."

Mr. EDWARD MOLLENHAUER's "choral symphonious painting," musically illustrative of COLLINS' "Ode to the Passions," was performed at Steinway Hall last evening. It is the work of a composer of undoubted talent and experience. A musician from boyhood, a violinist of eminence, a skilled professor, Mr. MOLLENHAUER's thoughts could hardly have had inadequate expression in a language of which he has been master almost from his birth. In his latest composition they are invested with their full weight, and if their effect is not as potent as the musician's friends could wish, their mode of utterance at least is unimpeachable. But it is with poets in music as with poets in words and in pictorial art. RUSKIN wisely holds that the painter who can reproduce objects upon canvas with ordinary fidelity has only accomplished as much towards becoming a great painter as a practiced grammarian and rhetorician has done towards being a laureate of verse. Mr. MOLLENHAUER's task has, it is true, been a less ambitious one than might be inferred, as he has chosen a text instead of seeking to create text and comment, but it has been a difficult one. He has succeeded in it, we have said, in respect of the complete attainder of a limited ideal. But he has not fulfilled it with the genius of SCHUMANN and MENDELSSOHN, whose examples in symphony he has striven to imitate. Mr. MOLLENHAUER's music to "The Passions," judging from the one hearing we were privileged to have of it, is notable neither for melodic wealth, nor for that sensuousness of harmony which, in the productions of some composers, and especially in those of SPOHR, cause one to forget the slender allowance of thematic beauty. COLLINS' "Ode" is too well known to require recapitulation here with a view to recalling the variety of its episodes, and thus indicating the musician's resources. Mr. MOLLENHAUER has divided it into nine principal parts, and has sought to express in as many movements and after a descriptive prelude, Fear, Anger, Despair, Hope, Revenge, Jealousy, Melancholy, Cheerfulness and Joy. The contrast of subjects is sufficiently clear in the poem, and in the outlines of the music is also sufficiently distinct, the third movement (Fear) and the one denoting Cheerfulness being especially satisfactory; but no passage is to be singled out for evident or mystic beauty, or for positive individuality of idea or form. Taken in connection with the reading of the "Ode" during the performance, or with a perusal of the elaborate programme, the larger portion of the work makes, to our thinking, an impression akin to that produced by the orchestral music accompanying at intervals dramatic entertainments abroad and intensifying the power of certain situations. The scores of "Manfred" and of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" aside from their value as models of massiveness and symmetry, tell stories of their own. "The Passions," which were listened to last night with attention and approved by frequent applause, could not have had more careful and perfect instrumental interpretation than was given them by a large orchestra, admirably led by Mr. MOLLENHAUER himself. A choral illustration of Hope, more consolatory than hopeful in theme, was well rendered by the chorus, and occasional solo verses were sung with more precision than sentiments by Mme. SALVOTTI. The poem was read by Mr. EDWIN BOOTH, the value of whose personal presence would have been enhanced by a warmer interest in COLLINS' verses. Mr. MOLLENHAUER's symphony will be repeated at the same place this evening.

The Foreign Drama.

TOM TAYLOR'S NEW PLAY.

The Pall Mall Gazette supplies the following article on Mr. TOM TAYLOR's new play, just now produced at the Queen's Theatre, in London. "The new work," it says, "owes its origin to a German play of some twenty years' standing, called "Elizabeth, Prinzessin von England," in five acts, "with an after act," of which Mme. CHARLOTTE VON-BIRCH PFEIFFER is the author. It seems probable that the lady, in her turn, was indebted for her materials to Mr. HARRISON AINSWORTH'S "Tower of London," a romance which, fortified by some of Mr. GEORGE CRUIKSHANKS' most effective etchings, enjoyed a great popularity a generation ago, and, indeed, appeared in a melodramatic form at certain of the minor theatres. Mr. TOM TAYLOR has issued a kind of manifesto in which he makes avowal that he is under some obligation to the German writer, while he is careful to claim credit for a large measure of originality. He commenced his labors, it would appear, with an intention simply to adapt Mme. BIRCH-PFEIFFER'S drama to the English stage, and his earlier scenes follow pretty closely the German original. By-and-by, however, he found it expedient to depart from the course he had prescribed to himself, shut up the lady's book, and trust wholly to his own inventive faculties. Thus midway his drama ceases to correspond with Mme. BIRCH-PFEIFFER'S, contains much new matter, and introduces characters who have no existence on the German stage. Towards the close of his task, however, as if fatigued with the responsibilities of creation, Mr. TAYLOR, like a lover who has only temporarily lapsed into infidelity, rejoins the object of his attentions, and terminates his drama much after the manner. It is plain, therefore, that there is quite as much native as foreign produce in "Twixt Axe and Crown;" and though Mr. TAYLOR's advertisement is conveyed in somewhat self-assertive terms, he is to be complimented on the candor of his avowals. He was anxious to avoid, as he says, "a newspaper discussion of the respective parts in the play of the German and English dramatists." His ingenuousness is clearly thus placed beyond impeachment, it being understood that foreign authors must submit to this method of manipulating their works, and be content to be regarded for theatrical purposes rather as the producers of raw material than of completely manufactured goods. If dispossessed of any credit that may be their lawful due in the matter, they are, by way of compensation, relieved of all liability in regard to the manner of submitting their achievements to the criticism of a distant audience. Taking Mr. TAYLOR's play as it stands, it may be accounted an attempt to present history as a dramatic entertainment of the Shakespearean school, and to bring upon the stage the reign of Queen MARY, the daughter of HENRY VIII., more especially with reference to her relations with her half-sister, the Princess ELIZABETH. The drama has both the merits and defects of its class. The historical play suffers invariably from its foregone conclusion, and the impossibility, beyond certain limits, of molding and shaping its events to serve the purposes of theatrical effect. Its story is without the cohesion and completeness necessary to the exciting of dramatic interest. Long lapses of time necessarily separate its incidents, and its scenes and situations, however artfully they may be treated, hang loosely together. On the other hand, the play wright has considerable liberty, and his plea of "history" enables him to evade compliance with the ordinary restrictions of dramatic composition. He can introduce all kinds of characters; he can let event follow event, ruled only by reference to his good pleasure in the matter; due sequence, consistency, and constructive skill are of small consideration with him. Deficiency in regard to plot, however, tells generally against the historical play. The dramatist has to contend with an unconcerned and apathetic audience. In this way Mr. TAYLOR's drama suffered. Its real theme, the supposed love of Mary and Elizabeth for Courtenay, Earl of Devonshire, is very slight, and cannot be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. Mary is jealous and vindictive, and confines Elizabeth and Courtenay in the Tower. The characters make many fervid speeches, but the interest cannot be fanned into a genuine flame. Mary dies; Courtenay dies; Elizabeth is left alone, and the play at last expires of a kind of inanition. The subject is, of course, eked out and supplemented in various ways. Mr. TAYLOR congratulates himself upon the number of subordinate characters he has introduced into his work; and certainly with the best advice that can be tendered to him is that he should forthwith suppress the majority of these as mere hindrances to such action as there is in the drama, and deadweights upon its animation. There is a wonderful conspiracy between Gardiner, the Bishop of Winchester, and Simon Renard, the Spanish envoy, which, of course, leads to nothing. A pair of tedious lovers, faint reproductions of Benedict and Beatrice, flit across the stage. Then of course there is a measure of pageantry and scenic illusion of no very admirable kind. Further, there is an unlimited supply of blank verse; but, though an accomplished writer, Mr. TAYLOR is by no means a poet, and the trick of stilted pseudo-Elizabethan dialogue has lost much of its power to charm. It should be recognized, however, that the play has distinct literary merit, and in point of genuine worth is immeasurably in advance of many of the works which have recently enjoyed the favor of the town. It could only have been written by a man of literary taste and cultivation. Let it further be added that, though found occasionally tedious, its reception by the audience was, upon the whole, highly favorable. Certain of its defects, moreover, can be remedied by wholesome application of the pruning knife, and doubtless in future representations the actors will manifest improvement.

The Grand Army of the Constitution.

Since the organization of the First Camp of the Grand Army of the Constitution as a rival to the Grand Army of the Republic, large accessions to its numbers are said to have been made. As the new institution conducts all its business with closed doors, but little of its doings and sayings are permitted to be known. It is purely a Democratic organization, and, of course, will be conducted solely in the interest of that party. Several new camps have been opened during the past fortnight. A lively contest is now going on as to who shall be selected for State Commander. The names of Generals SLOCUM, PRATT, MCQUADE, WARD and others have been prominently mentioned for that position. General SAMUEL GRAHAM has been chosen by the parent camp as District Commander on Long Island. The post of Most Eminent Commander, it is understood, will be tendered to Major-General GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN, and, in case of his non-acceptance, Major-General HANCOCK will be the next choice of the order. The notice of the organization, published a fortnight ago, created considerable sensation amongst the members, and amongst soldiers of Democratic proclivities, and sundry high officials have been active in their endeavors to obtain information relative to the movement.

CUBAN AFFAIRS.

ARRIVAL OF THE CITY OF MEXICO.

The steamship City of Mexico, from Sisal, Vera Cruz, via Havana Feb. 7, reached this port yesterday. By the courtesy of Purser BENSEL, our Havana correspondence, later by three days than was that printed in the TIMES of yesterday, came promptly to hand.

Further Effects of the Murder of Castanon—The Assassination of Americans—Movements and Triumphs of Goyeneche.

From Our Own Correspondent.

HAVANA, Monday, Feb. 7, 1870.

The killing of CASTANON created a very bitter feeling among the Spaniards, and revived the dormant spirits of the ultras, and the revengeful feelings of those who think that the revolution can be finished by the assassination of private individuals. But in justice to the Volunteers, who are abused and accused of having committed every act of barbarity, I am compelled to state that private vengeance, so common among the inhabitants of this country, has also had a large share. The killing of LUNA is one of these cases, the murder being committed by a man whom he had displaced in the affections of his mistress. Other crimes were committed by negroes, and we have only one really authenticated case in which the murder was committed by the volunteers, namely, that of VICENTE DAUMY.

ASSASSINATION OF AMERICANS.

The telegraph has transmitted to you such accurate accounts of the few incidents attending the shooting of Mr. GREENWALDTH and of his associates that I need not rehearse the sad story. But it is to be noted that after GREENWALDTH was shot, the murderer fired two more shots, one at FOSTER and another at JOHNSON, both of whom were wounded. GREENWALDTH attempted to defend himself, but finding this useless, a number of the rabble and some volunteers having by that time gathered, the party sought to make their escape. The cry of "atajo," the stop thief of the Spaniards, was then raised, and the four innocent Americans were pursued by a rabble of at least 50 persons. GREENWALDTH was caught, and also JOHNSON and FOSTER, when the whole crowd began to beat them, GREENWALDTH expiring in a few moments. The other two were rescued by some policemen and armed volunteers, who carried them to the hospital, where their wounds were dressed. They were then brought to their houses, where both now lie in a very dangerous condition. The affair created intense excitement; and the action of the authorities, and a certain change in the public feeling, has demonstrated that such cowardly assassinations cannot and will not be permitted with impunity, the action of General RODAS in connection with this sad affair being ample evidence of the fact. The agent of the Associated Press called on him to learn the particulars of the matter as received by the General when he was immediately admitted to the General's private office, where the Governor, the Judge of the Supreme Court and several other prominent officials were assembled. The Captain-General was furious. His orders were that the perpetrators of the deed must be discovered at all hazards; that if caught, a drum head court martial be organized and the guilty parties shot within two hours. The Governor and Judiciary have put all the forces at their command in motion, the volunteer officers have promised to aid in discovering the culprits, and there is no doubt that the Captain-General is terribly in earnest, and so are all the other high officials. At the mentioning of offering a reward, the Captain-General said that although the Spanish law did not countenance or mention anything of this practice, and that a reward had never been offered before, he would nevertheless order $1,000 to be paid to any person who would capture or denounce the culprits. This promise will be published in the papers of to-morrow, and if the Police is fit for anything, I am sure that the guilty will be punished.

GOYENECHE'S CAMPAIGN.

This column, composed of some six thousand of the best drilled and best armed troops, having marched triumphantly from Santi Espiritu to Puerto Principe without having seen a single rebel, started on their new campaign Jan. 17, from Puerto Principe. For the purpose of ascertaining PUELLO's whereabouts, they took the direction of the Najasa district, which was reported to be full of insurgents and masked batteries and the centre of the rebel Government. For this purpose the division was divided into three columns, under the respective commands of Colonels TAJARDO, CHINCHILLA and General GOYENECHE. Colonel TAJARDO took the Santa Cruz turnpike and reached Najasa on the 21st, where he was joined by Colonel CHINCHILLA and the Commander-in-Chief. All the villages, ranches and houses had been found burnt down by the rebels and every vestige of food destroyed or removed. The troops were continually harassed on the march, the rebels retreating as the Spaniards advanced, (with but little loss on either side,) until they reached the great rebel intrenched camp of Asiento, a long description of which is given in the official report. This was assaulted on all sides, and after a feeble resistance the rebels took to the woods, setting the large barracks on fire before retiring. Having got into the thick forests in the rear of the fortress, they were not pursued. After this affair General GOYENECHE states he heard PUELLO had retreated towards St. Miguel, and he resolved to repair thither for further orders, flanking the rebel positions; no enemies, however, were found in the intrenchments. The Spanish troops bivouacked at Tana and thence marched to Libanica, having had several small brushes with the enemy, who invariably retreated. The Spaniards captured here a youth who is reported to be either the son or the nephew of President CESPEDES. After leaving Savanilla the Spanish division took up their line of march through the Imias forest, where the whole rebel force had concentrated for a fight. Their strength is estimated by GOYENECHE as being about 1,500 men with three pieces of artillery. They were well protected with good intrenchments and a stockade. But the flank movements of GOYENECHE's forces and a few timely shells set the rebels again in motion, and after destroying the works, attending to the wounded and burying the dead, the column marched back into Puerto Principe with five prisoners. The enemy is reported to have lost seventy-seven killed, among these six officers, many wounded and sixteen prisoners. The Spaniards lost one officer and four soldiers killed, and three officers and twenty-two soldiers wounded. Great injury was done the rebels by the destruction of the warehouses, workshops, &c. The army is, of course, extolled for instances of extraordinary valor, suffering and privations of all kinds.

QUASIMODO.

The Newark Murder—Verdict of Guilty in the Second Degree.

At 7:30 o'clock last evening the jury in the case of LEONHARDT SCHUMM, who murdered CONRAD STOOL, came in, and returned a verdict of "guilty of murder in the second degree." The jury had been out some thirty hours, having been unable to agree on the degree of crime.

Murder Trial in Newark—Arraignment of Rosanna Rogers, the Alleged Murderess of her Step Brother.

The case of ROSANNA ROGERS, the girl who is charged with having killed her step brother, JAMES SHERIDAN, at Newark, N. J., on the 10th of November last, came up in the Court of Oyer and Terminer yesterday. It will be remembered that on the night in question JAMES SHERIDAN, a 'longshoreman, residing at No. 40 Oxford-street, paid a visit to his step mother, and while there became involved in a quarrel with his step sister, the accused, who, as is alleged, struck him on the head with a smoothing iron, thereby causing his death. Next morning an inquest was held and a verdict to the effect that JAMES SHERIDAN came to his death at the hands of ROSANNA ROGERS, and that ROSANNA ROGERS was guilty of manslaughter. The case was called at 10 o'clock yesterday morning. Several witnesses were examined. Mrs. ELLEN SHERIDAN, widow of the deceased, testified to the fact of the quarrel, and swore that ROSANNA knocked JAMES down, his head falling against a window; that he died next morning and that before his death ROSANNA had come to his bedside and said, "Oh, what did he compel me to fight with me for?" Dr. DODD, the County Physician, testified to having made a post-mortem examination of the deceased and found the cause of death to have been the blow on the head. Mrs. SHERIDAN was again called, and the case was then adjourned until Monday evening.

FORTY-FIRST CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WASHINGTON, Saturday, Feb. 12.

Mr. SHANKS, of Indiana, presented the resolutions of the Louisville Commercial Convention in favor of granting aid to the Mediterranean and Oriental Steam Navigation Company.

PETITIONS.

Petitions were presented as follows:

By Mr. SCHUMAKER, of the Cigar Makers' Union No. 97, of Brooklyn, favoring an increase of the duties on imported cigars. Also of the Columbia Iron Works, and of other manufacturers of steel tools, against the increase of the duties on steel.

By Messrs. STRONG, STARKWEATHER, KNAPP and KELLOGG, several petitions for an increase of the duty on cigars.

By Mr. STARKWEATHER, of the Norwich File Works, for a reduction of the tariff on steel.

By Mr. O'NEILL, of the College of Physicians of Philadelphia, for the proper rank, &c., to the Medical Officers of the Navy.

By Mr. KELLOGG, a like petition from the Medical Institution of Yale College.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced and disposed of as follows:

By Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio—Directing the Secretary of State to cause the remains of General WILLIAM STEADMAN, late United States Consul at Santiago de Cuba, to be sent to his late home in Portage County, Ohio. Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. LOGAN—For the relief of NORMAN WIARD. Referred.

By Mr. GARFIELD, of Washington Territory—Granting lands for a railroad from the Columbia River to Puget Sound. Referred.

By Mr. BANKS—Granting a pension to JOHN KETTS, the old revolutionary soldier to whom the privilege of the floor was given a few days since. Referred.

By Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts—To authorize the sale of a small detached piece of land belonging to the Springfield Armory. Passed.

By Mr. STARKWEATHER—To regulate the rank of staff officers in the navy. Referred.

By Mr. JUDD—To construe section 4 of the act of March 31, 1868, exempting certain manufactures from the Internal tax, so as not to treat as manufacturers hog packers, lard renderers, or persons engaged in saving hams or canning meats, or in the provision trade, &c., and to refund on it taxes already collected.

Mr. COX hoped this bill would be reported and passed without delay, as it affected the whole provision business of the United States.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

DEPARTMENT BALANCES.

Mr. BECKS offered a resolution

Directing the Secretary of the Treasury to state the amount of unexpended balances for the various departments at the end of each fiscal year.

Mr. WARD objected.

Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts, said that the resolution only directed the Secretary to do what was his duty under the law to do, and which had been always done until last year.

Mr. WARD withdrew his objection, and the resolution was adopted.

THE LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. BLAIR in the chair, on the Legislative Appropriation bill.

The amendment offered by Mr. DAWES, of New-York, yesterday, to strike out the appropriation for reporters for the Congressional Globe was discussed for half-an-hour and rejected, only three members voting for it.

Mr. FINKELNBURG moved to reduce the item for public printing from $500,000 to $50,000, based on the proposed abolition of the franking privilege.

Mr. LAFLIN, Chairman of the Committee on Printing, suggested that it would not be desirable to cut down this item, as it was not too much for the absolutely necessary printing, and promised that his committee would report a bill on the subject of printing which would meet the most economical desire of the House.

Mr. DAWES said there were four items of printing which had nothing to do with the franking privilege, and which alone amounted to $352,906. These items were: For the Patent Office, $57,960; for the Treasury Department, which used to be done at the Treasury, $36,200; for all the Departments, $156,746; and for the Post Office printing, $102,000.

The discussion occupied about an hour, and was further participated in by Messrs. ELA, SARGENT, MAYNARD, LAFLIN and BUTLER of Massachusetts, the latter suggesting that if the heads of departments or of bureaus were not fit to be trusted with ordering the amount of printing which they required, they were not fit to be trusted with their positions. He thought that that was a matter which might safely be left to those officers without interference on the part of the Houses.

Mr. DAWES commented upon the lecture read to the House by his "gentle colleague," whose conversion seemed as sudden and remarkable as that of him who traveled to Damascus. He (DAWES) apprehended it to be his duty whenever such a question was before the House, faithfully calmly, justly and impartially, but without fear, favor, or affection, to make diligent inquiry where every dollar of the public money had gone or might go; and so long as he had the confidence of the House and of the country, he should continue to pursue that course without regard to such lectures.

Mr. BUTLER disclaimed all intention of lecturing the House, and desired once for all to put a bar against the analogy between Saul of Tarsus and himself. He had heard it nineteen times and a half in the House. There were three things which he thought might be omitted hereafter, because the country understood them; first, that he was not for JEFF. DAVIS; second, that he had got a sudden conversion, and third, that he had not been in the Republican Party as long as some other people—all that was true. He had no doubt that in the old times there were men who stood by Judas, and against Paul, because Judas was the old Apostle. [Laughter.]

The amendment was rejected.

One of the items for the library of Congress brought out an attack from Mr. WOOD against the librarian for admitting books of a scurrilous, infamous and indecent character to its shelves, specifying particularly a scurrilous and libellous assault upon a member of the House, a calumny published anonymously against him during a heated political caucus. The Librarian was defended by Mr. HALDEMAN, who said he had never met a librarian more thoroughly acquainted with the books in his charge than that gentleman; by Mr. PALMER, who intimated that the pamphlet complained of was only making grave charges against Mr. WOOD while Mayor of New-York; by Mr. BANKS, on general and personal grounds.

In reference to the item for periodicals and newspapers for the library, Mr. POTTER called attention to the absence of all facilities for having access to the magazines; and Mr. DAWES thought the suggestion was a good one and should be taken into consideration by the Library Committee.

Mr. GARFIELD offered an amendment requiring the library to be kept open in the evening from 7 o'clock until 10 o'clock. Agreed to.

The appropriations for the botanical garden provoked the usual criticism, but they passed without amendment.

The Committee rose, having disposed of about one-fifth of the bill, and the House, at 4 o'clock, adjourned.

The District-Attorney to His Anonymous Correspondents.

The District-Attorney of Kings County makes the following explicit reply to numerous anonymous communications received by him while conducting the prosecution in the Hayes murder case:

DISTRICT-ATTORNEY'S OFFICE, KINGS COUNTY,
No. 3 COUNTY COURT HOUSE.
BROOKLYN, Feb. 12, 1870.

To the River Thieves, Cut Throats and Murderers of New-York and Brooklyn:

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the numerous communications recently addressed to me by members of your powerful fraternity, in relation to EDWIN PERRY, Esq., and to respectfully inform you in answer thereto that that gentleman has been admitted to bail.

The delay in notifying you of the latter circumstance, was occasioned entirely by my ignorance of the fact, before the official announcement this morning; but you, whose sources of information are so much better than my own, that you were aware of the result in Cherry-street two days ago, will readily and kindly excuse the omission on my part; and in view of the satisfactory conclusion, will probably be good enough to forego your amiable intentions, so forcibly and warmly expressed towards myself in the communications already referred to. I deem it all the more necessary to call your attention to the subject, as the immunity heretofore occasionally enjoyed by you in your praiseworthy business has been recently increased to such an extent as to render murder in this county entirely and absolutely safe hereafter, no risk whatsoever attaching to the felonious taking of human life.

Having accomplished all that you desired however; having strong and reliable assurances of protection and immunity hereafter for whatever you may do, you will at once perceive, Messrs. river thieves, cut throats and murderers, that there is no absolute necessity at present existing for the destruction of my insignificant life; and this being so, may I be permitted to indulge the hope that you will kindly permit me to live a short time longer, at least until I again offend by attempting to bring any of your distinguished members to justice.

Besides, gentlemen, as your business is done out of Court and mine is done in Court, we will not necessarily conflict hereafter, and inasmuch as your business will be done out of Court before I begin in Court, we need not necessarily quarrel any more.

I have the honor to subscribe myself

THE GOSPEL AMONG THE THIEVES

Another Chapter of the Church Militant —A Burglar Turned Missionary.

The writer in the International, from whom we lately quoted, furnishes some additional details of the work of Evangelization which is being conducted among the thieves of the English metropolis. These we translate for the benefit of our readers. On the same evening that I accompanied Rev. ARTHUR MURSELL to the thieves' festival, a meeting of a no less extraordinary character was taking place in the New Cut. A tolerably spacious building, situated in that locality, had been converted from a singing-saloon into a meeting house, which has been christened Gospel Hall. On the evening in question, a very remarkable company of about two hundred persons were assembled in this place. The presiding genius was no other than Mr. EDWARD WRIGHT, better known under his professional designation of Mickey Moon. Ask the first thief you meet who is Mickey Moon, and he will tell you that some years ago he was a brother of the craft, and achieved great distinction as a pugilist and burglar, but that now he wears a black coat and a white collar—that Mickey has, in fact, turned preacher.

Mr. WRIGHT himself relates that his conversion took place in listening to a sermon one Sunday in Astley's Amphitheatre. Since then he has devoted his life to working for the salvation of his comrades, and has not ceased by night or day to exhort them to repentance. On the evening of which we speak, the converted burglar had gathered round him some two hundred and twenty professional thieves. In order to be admitted it was necessary to prove having undergone a criminal conviction, and after being admitted each individual was regaled with a basin of soup and a large piece of bread. More than three hundred claimed admission. Among the two hundred whose claims were allowed there were about a dozen noted burglars who had suffered several years transportation. Six of these, still young, represented together a total of sixty-seven years of hard labor. The remainder were composed of subordinate grades, such as "smide pitchers," whose functions I can't explain, "bluey hunters," whose department is to strip lead from the house tops, and "prigs," or ordinary thieves. The devoted WRIGHT had the utmost trouble to keep order. The crowd threatened to break open the doors and to take forcible possession of the soup and bread, and sundry interlopers had found entrance into the room. My friends, said WRIGHT to the thieves who were provided with tickets, there are only a certain number of plates of soup and pieces of bread, and a certain number of people to consume them; so keep your eyes open and come down upon any one that attempts to secure more than her share. After this repast the quondam burglar proceeded to deliver a discourse, in the course of which he related the circumstances under which his conversion had taken place. Before he was seventeen he had broken into several houses, and had received twenty-four stripes with the cat-o'-nine-tails. Although these lashes, he said, had failed to reach his heart, it melted at the sound of the words which called him to repentance. When his hearers failed to accord him a due amount of attention, or when a disturbance broke out in any part of the room, the orator shouted: Let the strangers present see you are men, and do not give them occasion to say that you have descended to the level of brutes. One of the worthies present contradicted WRIGHT so incessantly that the entire meeting demanded his expulsion. No, no, interposed the preacher, don't chuck him out, whisper in a quiet and friendly way into his ear. Now, then, you blockhead, will you be long in being done with your noise?" The rebellious auditor considered the remark as made and held his tongue. In this way two hours passed over. After the discourse the greater part of the audience left, but several remained to assist at a religious service which took place immediately after.

[A Female Gathering in Gospel Hall.

As a sequel to the above we present an interesting account, furnished by the London Daily News, of a similar entertainment chiefly composed of female thieves, under the Presidency of the converted burglar above noted. The supper being intended especially for female (as one given last week was devoted to male) thieves, the women had exclusive, or almost exclusive, possession of the floor, and the men were sent up into the gallery. When there they were so much removed from observation that we shall not attempt minutely to describe their appearance. Suffice it to say that, although the countenances of one or two seemed to indicate recollections of the crank, and to suggest possibilities of the treadmill, they behaved upon the whole very quietly and orderly. Once or twice while WRIGHT was speaking he felt it necessary to call them to order, and at last he asked some of "our navvy brethren" to go and sit among them. We are ignorant of the exact authority enjoyed or exercised by a "navvy brother," but their presence in the gallery was sufficient to procure complete silence among its occupants, and NED had no further occasion to rebuke them. The women who, as we have said, numbered about seventy, were of all ages, from 16 to 60, or probably more. Babies—and one there was so wizen and so wan, so small of size, and so pinched of feature that it seemed not like the offspring of a human mother—although all trace of humanity was not yet beaten out of the features of the thin pale girl who held her in her arms—but rather like a juvenile ape or monkey which by some freak of Nature had approached more than ordinarily close to a resemblance to mankind—we do not include in this calculation. All the women and girls were, to judge from their appearance, thieves of the meanest and most miserable kind. There was no show of success or pride, or even bravado, about them. They did not include among their number a single specimen of the genteel-looking, elegantly-dressed "lady" who filches a purse in an omnibus, or whips a roll of costly lace from a counter, or of the stalwart, flaunting, audacious "blowen" who holds a foolish "fast" man with her arms while her pal knocks him on the head and rifles his pockets of his watch and valuables. And had the appearance of petty pilferers, and pilferers with whom pilfering had gone very hard, and to whom it had brought few gains, many punishments, and much suffering. With the exception of two or three girls on one of the front benches, who wore bright wraps round their necks and showy feathers in their jaunty hats, the clothes of all were mean, and poor, and scanty; their faces were pinched and drawn by want and hunger, and their manner was watchful, timid and cowed. Of the few girls who looked better fed and better clothed, who still retained some of the freshness of girlhood and some of the daring mirth of youth and innocence, two or three were afflicted with racking coughs that shook them at times from head to foot, which told a sad tale of constant exposure to wind and rain and storm, and threatened in unmistakable tones a speedy termination of their miserable careers. The supper which was provided consisted of large bowls of strong peasoup, replenishable at the will of the consumer, and huge lumps of good wholesome bread. The girls in the front places did not appear to greatly relish their entertainment. They laughed loudly, almost contemptuously, among themselves when the huge bowls of steaming soup were presented to them; and although they ultimately stowed away the "toke" in pockets or shawls, they hardly touched the steaming liquid. Not so their older and more experienced fellow-criminals. With them the pangs of hunger were sharper, the doubts as to to-morrow's meal evidently more serious. Soup and bread disappeared with equal rapidity, and more than one poor woman asked for and received another and yet another allowance. The eagerness of their appetites seemed to increase with their advance in years, and the old nursery maxim, that "the eldest should have the most," was strictly, though unintentionally, carried into practice.

After supper the women sang a hymn from a collection arranged by NED WRIGHT himself, and the old anthem, "I will arise and go unto my Father." Both these pieces were, upon the whole, well sung, and in the latter, which seemed well known to most of the guests, their voices became quite musical, with the music inspired by deep feeling and genuine interest. After offering up a prayer of moderate length, the more earnest appeals in which were responded to by the women with murmurs of sympathy and frequent utterances of the "Amen," NED WRIGHT read a portion of the fifteenth chapter of St. Luke, and then leaving the Prodigal Son envying the pigs whom it was his business to feed, dashed somewhat suddenly into a discourse which was half speech half sermon, and in some respects neither one nor the other. WRIGHT, though essentially a street preacher, and having many of the faults and most of the characteristics of that class of orator, is still something more than a street preacher. Though sometimes inappropriately vehement in his manner, he can be really earnest and truly impassioned. His better manner is the colloquial, and he is at his best when he is delineating some scene or repeating some incident in which he has himself taken part, or in contrasting his own sufferings, or those of his hearers, with the tortures and indignities endured for their sakes by the Savior of mankind. His matter is not well arranged, his transitions from one branch to another being somewhat too abrupt, and probably rather puzzling to people unused to religious discourses of this class; but he keeps his main subject well in view throughout, and his points are, as a rule, clear and telling. His own conversion, it seems, occurred at a religious service at Astley's Theatre some six or seven years ago. At that time he was engaged to fight JACK CONYERS, of Bankside, and the first proof which he gave of his new condition of mind was to throw up that affair, much to the disgust of the "maddened" MIKE MADDEN, who, according to his account, was only restrained by the direct intervention of Providence from knocking him down. Soon after his conversion he was without employment for thirteen weeks, and during that time he, his wife—who had always behaved well to him, and for whom he seems to have ever preserved a deep attachment—and his children, suffered the extreme of poverty. The best and most affecting passage in his speech last night was a description of a scene in his miserable home just at the close of this period. My wife had divided their last piece of hard dry bread between the two almost starving "bairns," he took it without a murmur, and never asked for butter, and they were sitting opposite to each other, contemplating their future in blank despair. "My heart," we give his own words, "was broken, and the devil suggested to me, 'Ned, you can get money, why don't you?' That started the tears to my eyes like rain. My heart beat like the clapper of a bell. My wife saw me and started to speak. With her utterance choked, she said, 'Never mind, Ned, don't cry. A crust with Christ is better than the whole world without him.' That very afternoon, at 4 o'clock, a man came to my house and told me of a job. I went to work for 25s. a week, and have never wanted a pound from that day to this." This simple story, told in almost trembling accents, entirely enchained the attention of his audience, who almost sobbed out their sympathy with its narrator and his pious and courageous wife.

QUARANTINE REFORMS.

Meeting of the Commissioners—Vessel Owners State Their Grievances.

The Quarantine Commissioners met at No. 155 Broadway, yesterday afternoon, for the purpose of hearing such suggestions as the merchants and others interested in the commerce of the port might have to make concerning the conduct of affairs at Quarantine and as to the need of reforms therein. Commissioners HUNT, BELL and BARTON were present, as was also Dr. CARNOCHAN, the newly-appointed Health Officer.

Mr. VAN BRUNT, President of the New-York Vessel Owners' Association, which is made up mostly of owners of coasters, addressed the Commission on behalf of relieving the vessels plying between New-York and the waters of Maryland and Virginia from the onerous exactions imposed on them. These vessels, he said, although they might present a clean bill of health, were invariably detained at least twenty-four hours at Quarantine. Baltimore, in retaliation for this, detained vessels putting into that port from New-York twenty-four hours, thus causing a total delay of forty-eight hours on each trip, (and these vessels make about twenty per year,) whereby a great drawback was put upon commerce.

Mr. R. P. BUCK remarked that the Quarantine laws became more and more strict every year, and that merchants and shipowners now desired relief from many useless and onerous exactions. One grievance was that they were compelled to pay double price for lighterage for discharging cargoes—twice as much to the Quarantine lightermen as they would pay were they allowed to select and employ their own men. Another grievance was that captains of vessels are charged $4 for being brought up from the lower Quarantine, when they might, if allowed, come up in their own boats without cost. Fifteen dollars is charged for fumigating a vessel, the actual cost of the fumigating process being about $1. Any vessel from Cuba is kept ten days in quarantine, though she may have been out from Cuba twenty days, all well, and thus be proved to be in a perfectly healthy condition. He spoke also of a Mr. O'ROURKE who towed up vessels, charging from $40 to $60, according as he could make the Captains pay, when, if competition in towing were allowed, $20 was the highest price asked. This O'ROURKE was not a fit man to board vessels. Mr. BUCK contended, also that the expenses of Quarantine should be borne by the City or the State, and not by the vessel owners. In alluding to practices at Quarantine, he mentioned a case where a purported fine of $300 was put upon a captain for some alleged infraction of the law; but a compromise was effected by paying the trifling sum of $4 to an official.

Mr. TENURE hoped it would be understood that the Commissioners would hear appeals from the action of the Health Officer, whenever owners or merchants felt themselves aggrieved by such action. He hoped, also, that the Board, in conjunction with the Health Officer, would establish a code of regulations plainly setting forth what is hereafter to be expected from vessels entering from foreign ports. Neither the merchants nor owners objected to the Quarantine laws; all they asked was that the duty of Captains arising under these should be distinctly laid down, and that the laws should be faithfully enforced.

Mr. COLBY, of the Harbeck Stores, said that he knew of from $150 to $300 having been paid in order that vessels, though they had neither sickness nor death on board, might be allowed to come to dock.

Mr. WYLIE made a similar statement.

Mr. BRETT said that vessels frequently go into other ports, even as far off as Portland, Me., to be unladen, rather than be subjected to the annoyance that is put upon them in the quarantine of this port.

Dr. BELL (one of the Commission) said that they were authorized to hear appeals, to which Mr. TENURE had alluded; and, in reply to Mr. BUCK, he said that if the City or State paid the expense of quarantining vessels, the incentives of Captains and others to keep their ships in cleanly condition, would be in great part destroyed.

Mr. BUCK replied that he intended only to refer to the expense of the Commission, (salaries.)

Mr. POND (of POND & SAGE) spoke of the extortionate charges for lighterage at Quarantine, and favored the policy of allowing all lightermen to compete for the work, as was formerly the case. He instanced one case where his firm had to pay $800 more for this work than they would have done were the lighterage open to competition.

Mr. R. P. BUCK said so annoying had the quarantine arrangements of this port become that it was no uncommon thing for shipmasters in a foreign port, when offered certain pay for freight to North American ports, to answer, "Exclude New-York and I'll take it." If asked why they could not take freight to New-York for the proposed price, they would say it was because of the vexatious delays that invariably beset them at quarantine.

Mr. WAYDELL remarked that there was fault to be found with the charges for coopering at Quarantine. His firm was charged $108 for about $5 worth of work, and because they refused to pay it, the ship was detained at Quarantine.

Mr. PENDERGRAST and others made brief addresses, after which Hon. WILSON G. HUNT, Chairman of the Commission, said that the Board would take into consideration what had been said, and do all in their power for the benefit of the commerce of the port.

THE CASE OF HEFFERNAN.

Opinion of Judge McCunn—Right of Judge not in Oyer and Terminer to Discharge a Prisoner while that Court is Sitting—The Right Maintained.

As the question at issue in this case is one of grave importance, and the proceedings on the habeas corpus sued out by the prisoner have been necessarily published in a detached form, we herewith publish in full the opinion of Judge MCCUNN relating to the right of a Judge not sitting in Oyer and Terminer to entertain a motion to discharge in a case where a conviction has been had, even while the Oyer and Terminer is in actual session. The discharge of the prisoner was asked for by Mr. PETER MITCHELL, his counsel, on the grounds following:

First—That the Court affecting to try him had no jurisdiction in the case. The argument is, that by article 6, section 18, of the Constitution of the State, all judicial officers shall be elected by the people of the communities over which their jurisdiction extends. And that Messrs. DOWLING and BRADY, constituting the so-called Court of Special Sessions, which, in addition to jurisdiction over the whole City, were chosen only by the suffrages of seven wards, and so were not duly elected in conformity to the letter and spirit of the Constitution. Hence the contention is that their exercise of power, as members of the Court of Special Sessions, is a sheer usurpation. Second—By article 1, section 2, of the State Constitution, "the trial by jury, in all cases in which it has been heretofore used, shall remain inviolate forever." It is competent to the party accused to waive the privilege of trial by jury; but in this instance the allegation of the counsel is that the prisoner not only never waived, but expressly demanded, a trial by jury, as matter of absolute and indefeasible right, and that his trial in a mode unauthorized by the Constitution was invalid and of no effect. Hence the inference that his detention is without warrant of law.

Judge MCCUNN says: If either of the above propositions be tenable, it follows necessarily that the prisoner is entitled to a discharge. But the learned District-Attorney argues that the person upon whom the writ was served is not obliged to produce the prisoner, by reason of the following section in the Habeas Corpus act: "During the session of a Court of Oyer and Terminer no prisoner detained in the common jail of the county upon any criminal charge shall be removed therefrom by any writ of habeas corpus, unless such writ shall have been issued by such Court of Oyer and Terminer, or shall be returnable before it." Obviously, the present case is not within the provisions of the above section. The prisoner here is not confined on a criminal charge, but is detained in execution of a sentence already pronounced by the Court, and that Court has no longer jurisdiction over him. The above section was inserted for the evident purpose of preventing the removal or release of a prisoner held upon a charge and awaiting a trial; and the law intended that the legality of his detention on a criminal accusation should be determined only by the Court in which his trial is depending. If a writ of habeas corpus for the delivery of a person detained under civil process, need not be issued by or returnable before the Court of Oyer and Terminer; and for the same reason, the writ in the present case was properly returned before a Justice of this Court. This case is neither within the letter nor policy of the above provision, and that provision affords no excuse or justification for a refusal to produce the prisoner. It is a fundamental principle that the provisions of the Habeas Corpus act shall be generously construed in favor of the liberty of the citizen. Hence, provisions in restriction of the privileges and operation of the writ will be interpreted in a liberal sense. The Legislature must be taken to mean precisely what its language conveys—neither more nor less. That language imports that when a person is confined on a criminal charge he shall have recourse for deliverance but to one Court—the Court of Oyer and Terminer. It does not say or imply that when a man is imprisoned under a sentence of conviction—when he is no longer amenable to the Courts of criminal jurisdiction—that he shall be shut up from all access to other tribunals empowered to issue the writ of habeas corpus. To give it that construction would operate to the perversion of the law and the oppression of the citizen. As to the non-production of the prisoner. By section 9 of the Habeas Corpus act, it is enacted that "The person or officer on whom the writ shall have been served, shall bring the body of the person in his custody, according to the command of the writ, except in the case of the sickness of such person." And section 24 thereof provides that, if the person upon whom such writ of habeas corpus has been duly served, shall refuse or neglect to obey the same by producing the party named in such writ, and no sufficient excuse," i. e., of sickness, "shall be shown for such refusal, it shall be the duty of the Court or officer before whom such writ shall have been made returnable, forthwith to issue an attachment against such person," &c., &c. In this matter the prisoner is not produced according to the command of the writ; but, on the contrary, the person in whose custody he is expressly refuses to produce the prisoner. Nor is due service of the writ denied; nor is the only excuse allowed by law for the non-production of the prisoner urged by the jailer. Hence, I have no alternative under the express and imperative provisions of the statute, but "forthwith to issue an attachment" against the person so defying the mandate of the writ of habeas corpus. And I direct that such attachment do issue. The learned District-Attorney proposes to reargue, in support of the legality of the prisoner's detention, and perhaps he may show enough to require that "the prisoner should be remanded into custody." But in the face of an avowed disobedience of the writ, in view of the fact that it is the prisoner's right that all argument as to the legality of his detention should take place in his presence, and especially in consideration that if I decided against the legality of the prisoner's detention, I could not remand him

THE KANSAS PACIFIC RAILWAY

SEVEN PER CENT. GOLD LOAN.

The Agents of this Loan have to announce that they have only on hand $600,000 of the $6,500,000 Gold Land Grant Bonds, which they offer at the original price.

The work on the road has been rapidly pushed forward, 50 miles having been built since the loan was offered. This makes the whole line 355 miles. It is graded to the 487th mile post west from Kansas City. This loan is a mortgage upon the whole line. Upon the extension to Denver City it is a first mortgage.

The Kansas Pacific Railway

Is Now in Successful Operation for 455 Miles, and its business for 1869 shows a degree of unexpected prosperity. The following is a summary:

Earnings from freight.....	$1,560,419 27
Earnings from passengers and mail.....	717,521 19
Earnings from miscellaneous sources.....	7,909 65
Total.....	$2,225,850 11
Total expenses.....	1,386,180 02
Net earnings.....	$839,670 09

The vast land grant and the rapid sales of lands to settlers give the bond additional value. Out of its Kansas lands the Company in 1869 sold 342,745 acres of lands for $1,129,042 57, at an average price of $2 95 per acre. Part of this sum was in notes and obligations, so that from land sales alone the Company really earned in money $ 46,950 22.

The aggregate receipts of the year's business are as follows:

Railway earnings (net).....	$839,670 09
Profit from lands (net).....	246,950 22
Total.....	$1,086,620 31

The agents will furnish maps, circulars and pamphlets on application, and give all information. They recommend this bond as an especially good security for insurance and trust companies. Address

CARE OF STRANGERS.

The Sisters of the Stranger—What They Are Doing and What They Have Done.

CONSTANT MAYER'S new picture, "The Witch's Daughter," which has been in this City of late on exhibition for the benefit of the Sisters of the Stranger, is illustrative of a characteristic phase of New-England sentiment in the old time, the days of superstition and bigotry, and the adaptation of the work to its present purposes—to increase the revenue of the benevolent association named—is well contrived, as serving to suggest by contrasts the catholic spirit of this ere—the narrow mindedness of that.

In the times when, as we are told, the curse of the taunting and jeering multitude pursued the so-called necromancer's daughter, even "when she sought the house of prayer," who dreamed of a large-hearted benevolence to spring up in a sister State—not very far away—aided, perhaps, by the descendants of some of these same witch persecutors, to care for the unknown stranger, who, from remotest parts, might come to claim the warm hand grasp, the genial and brotherly counsel? yes, and pecuniary help, and help to fields of employment, too, from some whose faces he had never seen before.

This is not putting the matter too strongly, for, more than this, the society offers among its benefices to procure aid—medical, legal, spiritual—for strangers in distress, perplexity or sickness, no circumlocutory form being necessary in the approach. All, therefore, that one has to do is to present his application at the Bible House, Fourth-avenue, between Eighth and Ninth streets, at Room No. 45, between the hours of 9 and 12 A. M., and between 2 and 5 P. M. Gleaning here and there from the little sheet before us, The Stranger, published by the society, we find that "help of every practicable kind" is extended; nay more, proffered, without waiting for solicitation.

The association even holds itself responsible to recommend respectable boarding-houses to persons newly arrived in the City, with no data from which to judge of such, the worth of which arrangement none but a stranger in this great metropolis of strange devices and alluring appearances can ever properly estimate. Reliable information in every department, indeed, in which a stranger, rich or poor, may be interested, is sought out and furnished. The most eminent professional men in New-York—physicians, lawyers and divines, have acknowledged substantially the claims of this institution upon the benevolent, by giving carte blanche demand upon their gratuitous services, each in their respective vocations, whenever needed.

No creed or nationality is known in dispensation of the institution's favors, for, of the matter of belief, Catholic, Methodist—who not? are ready to testify to the liberal character of the organization, while the "sweet German accent and rich Irish brogue," nye, and specimen descendants of "all the rest of mankind," will tell you they never appealed here as strangers needing care and found it not. A pleasant room with pictures, periodicals, books, invites the stranger every week-day to its environs, between 9 and 1 o'clock, and 2 and 5 o'clock, and while speaking of this matter, it may not be amiss to indulge the hope that the appeal the society is making to book and periodical publishers will be heartily acknowledged by donations to this reading room for strangers. Books should be sent to Room No. 45 Bible House, but papers and magazines may be directed to "The Stranger, New-York."

Cases on cases might be cited, for they so multiply, in demonstration of the efficient work being done, but the limits of this article forbid; nevertheless, as the public likes something demonstrative and tangible, let the instance be written down as one in point of a destitute widow already the mother of two children; the claims of a third helpless little one impending in the near future. She is accosting a policeman as he treads his beat on one of our streets at evening. Alone, with her little children, she is in the great City, homeless, friendless, moneyless, foodless. Her husband died in Portland four months since. Then a fire came and burned up all the widow's and orphans' living. The brother she had come to New-York to seek was nowhere to be found.

"I can't do better for you than send you to the Sisters of the Stranger," the officer answered her, giving the address. She came, her needs were attended to, and she was made comfortable. At present she is in the society's hospital with the youngest of the children, while the eldest is well cared for outside.

The cry is, "Our work is for the world! We desire all the world to help us! The only limit to the amount of good which it is in our power to do for strangers is the means at our command." "Every dollar," they say, "intrusted to us will relieve some actual distress," and they ask those who dwell outside the great Metropolis, (as if it were a personal favor to themselves,) "If you will not do any more, will you not give our address to any of your friends who are coming to New-York, so that if they should be in trouble we may aid them?" A boon unpresumptuously solicited, surely. The charitably disposed, indeed, need not go far to seek a field for donations in money, clothing for men, women, babes, children of all ages, for Dr. DEEMS, the pastor of the Church for Strangers. The Sisterhood here named all pledge themselves to put to the most available use all contributions designed for that class we have especial command to "be not forgetful" in entertaining.

The Attempted Suicide in Brooklyn—Statements of Parties Interested—Condition of Mrs. Sinnett.

The attempted suicide of Mrs. MARY SINNETT, of No. 82 Wyckoff-street, Brooklyn, has opened a Pandora's box of secrets as to how the people's money is paid away by reckless officials, and gives some inkling as to why so much out-door poor money is used up every year. The case was briefly stated in the TIMES yesterday. The story is further told by the parties immediately interested in the exposé.

Mr. JOSEPH SINNETT, husband of the unfortunate woman, says:

I left home at ten o'clock on the 2d inst. and went on board the steamship Cleopatra, bound for Havana; we got cast away on Friday night last, and lost our rudder on Frying Pan Shoals, and we then turned back and have arrived in port to-day; was detained until the second Sunday in March, so that my wife did not expect me; when I came here to-day I found the door locked, and was forced to get in through the window shortly after I got there. A man came to the door and try to enter; could not think what he wanted, and watched him closely; was then in the adjoining room; he shook the door, but could not open it, and he was turning away from the door, when my wife, Mary Sinnett, came, and with a halloa, said, "the door is locked;" I then went in the back room again, and kept the door half open and looked out in the front room; my wife said, "that man, I was up to the Hall to-day, and there was another lady with me, and when she went into the closet a man went in after her, and they remained there for some time, and I got frightened for fear they had left a baby there." The man then got my wife on the lounge in the front basement, and from the lounge on to the floor. She said she was afraid Mr. BRODERICK would come in, and they remained on the floor for some time, I don't know how long, time. I was still looking on, but although I tried to control my feelings, I could not stand it any longer, and I rushed out and struck the man in the breast, and he then ran out, leaving my wife on the floor. I tore up the hat in anger. I then asked my wife who the man was, and she said she did not know. I waited for a while and asked her again, and at last she told me. It was JOHNNY GOLDEN, a clerk or outdoor visitor in the office of the Superintendents of the Poor. She then wanted to go out, but I said, "MARY you shall not go; you must go to Court to-morrow." "I shall have him arrested," Mr. BRODERICK then came in and my wife came in to the room and remained there for a short time. Soon after I heard a noise and found her on the floor in a pool of blood with her throat cut. She cut it with a razor; I think she had been drinking some; she has been in the habit of drinking some for a long time; she always has it; she had some things in a basket that I suppose she got at the hall, and I scattered them about the floor; we have been married for many years, and have two boys, WILLIAM and JOHN, aged respectively 15 and 16 years.

Of course, there was considerable squirming about the office of the Superintendents of the Poor at the Court House, long set down as a sink of vice and iniquity, and there had to be statements made, the parties thereanent not being glad enough to reveal, in the way of explanation.

Superintendent of the POOR FORAN said:

JOHN GOLDEN was an out door Inspector, attached to the office of the First District previous to my election as Superintendent. He had been acting in that capacity for six years, prior to that time, under Superintendent DELANEY, who highly recommended him to me for retention in office, as did also Alderman BERGH and Supervisor MURPHY, otherwise I should have removed him and appointed some man of whom I had personal knowledge in his place. Upon searching my books I find that MARY SINNETT, of No. 82 Wyckoff-street, was given weekly relief to the amount of five each week during the Winter of 1869. Since that time I find no record of relief, except upon the 4th and 11th of this present month, when she received $1 worth of groceries on each of those days. She was married as a native of Ireland, 27 years of age, as having four children—JOHN 13 years old; WILLIAM 10; MARY, 7, and ANN, 5. I have not yet seen GOLDEN this morning, but shall immediately commence an investigation of the case as far as my office is concerned. At present I have no knowledge or belief that any indecencies have been committed at my office, and I know nothing of those said to have been committed elsewhere. I have suspended GOLDEN until such time as an investigation can be made.

As the story would be incomplete without Mr. JOHN GOLDEN having his say, that is also added. He says:

I am one of the outdoor visitors attached to the office of the Superintendents of the Poor for the First District. Last Winter while I was engaged in that capacity, Mrs. SINNETT made an application at the office for relief, stating that her husband was absent; that she had two children, and had no means of support. I was sent to visit her residence, No. 82 Wyckoff-street, to see if she was a proper subject for relief. When I got there I found her husband at home, and reported against giving her outdoor relief. About a week since she made application again at the office for relief, on the same ground as on the previous occasion, and I was sent to inquire into the matter. Yesterday afternoon about 4:30 o'clock I went to the house, knocked at the door, and was admitted by Mrs. SINNETT. As I was going in I heard footsteps going from the basement into the bedroom, but paid no attention to it. I asked to see the two children Mrs. SINNETT had represented she had, but she tried to evade the question by telling a smutty story. I told her that I could not report in favor of giving her relief unless the children were produced, and was moving off when she put her hand on my shoulder and says, "Oh can't you give me some relief?" I said "I don't think you are entitled to it, for I think you are a drinking woman, anyhow." With that a man rushed out of the bedroom, and saying, "What are you doing here?" struck at the woman and then at me. I got out out on the sidewalk and went away. That is all I know of the matter. I never was in this woman's house except these two times, when I went on official business, and never had any improper relations with the woman, whom I had never spoken to except on these two occasions.

JOHN GOLDEN, notwithstanding his statement, occupies an unenviable position and is receiving the jeers and scoffs of all his old friends. He is an old Tenth Ward politician, and is brominently known in connection with carrying primaries through according to the programme set forth by the "boss," HUGH MCLAUGHLIN. Mr. SINNETT is reported as being a sober, industrious man, and he feels the disgrace his wife has thus brought upon his family deeply. As the investigation proceeds other cases of a similar character, in many respects, are expected to be revealed.

THE CONCRETE NUISANCE.

Opinion of the Counsel of the Board of Health—A Legal View of the Matter—Powers of the Board, &c.

The following opinion, which explains itself, was rendered by Mr. DORMAN B. EATON, yesterday:

NO. 2 EAST TWENTY-NINTH-STREET, }
NEW-YORK, Saturday, Feb. 5, 1870. }

The Secretary of the Metropolitan Board of Health:

SIR: Referred to me, jointly with the Sanitary Committee, of a petition for the removal of the alleged nuisance created on Fifth-avenue by the "Fisk concrete pavement," I beg to submit the following opinion as covering so much of the subject as comes within my department as counsel of the Board. The question for me to answer would seem to be, first, has the Board any power to give the relief prayed for; and, second, is it expedient to enter at this time upon the exercise of such power if it exist? I shall, of course, attempt to answer this last question only so far as it arises as a legal question. I do this Board is one of those fundamentals created by the Legislature for the government of the City of New-York, and the alleged nuisance must be accepted as the creation of another portion of the Government of the same City, a natural inference would seem to arise that one part of the Government causing the line of its duty when attempting to act in opposition to another part of the same Government. And the presumption thus encountered would not appear to be weakened when it is considered that this pavement was laid down with great energy of action, and has been rapidly extended to various streets, even since the defects and objections complained of have been apparent. However disagreeable it may be to this Board to be brought into collision with other parts of the City Government, and whatever presumptions it may thus have to overcome, I am of the opinion that citizens feeling themselves aggrieved have a right to appeal from the action of any part of the City Government that disregards their rights and creates a public nuisance, to any other part of the same Government which they may think willing and competent to afford them redress, and I think that the petition in that behalf must not be disregarded. Besides the petitions are so very numerous and are persons of so great intelligence and respectability, as to leave me no ground for a suspicion that they are mistaken or that they exaggerate the character of the nuisance, even if I had not had too much personal experience of the grievances of which they complain. The language of the petition makes out an aggravated nuisance which the petitioners say produces most serious diseases of the respiratory organs," and which when covered with water and slippery, "has caused serious injury from falls," and the wash from the dissolving tar and the dirt in solution "have blocked up the sewers," and as a general result, noxious exhalations in the summer time, and pervading, suffocating dust in dry days, have produced a condition of things on the main avenue in the City, and in streets adjacent, which, if not remedied, the petitioners declare "may produce a pestilence." And upon this petition I find the names of many physicians, and among them several of the greatest distinction in the City, including that of the Resident Physician of the City at the date of the creation of the Board. There can then be no doubt but there is a cause stated prejudicial to the public health, and which is a nuisance within the jurisdiction of this Board. I do not in coming to this conclusion from the face of the petition, take into account the injury to residences, the soiling of curtains and carpets, or the other vexations and annoyances resulting from the same cause, which the petitioners say render their homes "almost uninhabitable." For such grievances, however hard to be borne, are not properly within the jurisdiction of a Board of Health, and the petitioners must apply to the Court or the Street Department for relief from this class of nuisance. The jurisdiction of the Board over much of the matters of complaint as I have referred to as indirectly affecting the public health is, if the petitioners are correct in their facts, not doubtful. The fourteenth section of the act of 1866 declares that the Board may "order the removal of any substance in any street, &c., which the Board shall regard as dangerous or detrimental to life or health." And the same section declares that it shall be the duty of every public officer and Board, having charge of any street to keep the same in such condition, and also the drainage thereof that the same shall not be dangerous or prejudicial to life or health. Officials do not, however, have a right to create or maintain public nuisances, or to put the public health in peril. I think the public officers and Boards referred to in the law include the whole official force of the City of New-York. And the provisions as to those upon which the expenses of removing causes injurious to health may be imposed, are, I think, as full and positive as the obligation demanded to observe the sanitary precautions, without the observance of which life and health are in peril. It is also worthy of observation, in this connection, that the act of 1866 seems, in its language to contemplate that citizens might have occasion to invoke the beneficent action of this Board in the premises, in section 12 it is declared that the Board may exercise its powers "without the advice, assent or coöperation of any municipal Board or officer." The Health law of 1867 enables the Board to proceed by suit as well as by order for the removal of nuisances. I must, therefore, advise the Board, that if it shall agree in opinion with the petitioners, as to the effect upon life and health of the matters complained of, it may proceed to order the removal of the pavement complained of, and may execute that order at the expense of those responsible for it, or the Board may proceed by suit in its own name in the Courts against the City, and other persons who may be found to have coöperated in creating or continuing the nuisance. II. The question remaining to be answered is, whether it is expedient to make such order or institute such suit at this time; for the section 12 referred to makes the Board to some extent the judge whether it should proceed to exercise its powers at any particular time.

Regarding the question as I must only in its legal aspects, it seems to me that it is not expedient that the Board should make any order or institute any suit at present, and for the following reasons: 1. The action of the petitioners or of the criminal Courts, or some other influence, has caused measures to be taken under which a large force of carts and laborers are now engaged in removing the tarry pavement from the worst portions of the avenue; and although a material that looks like the original pavement is at the same time being laid down, doubtless for experiment, on the upper portion of the same avenue, the force taking it up lower down appears to be making such rapid progress that the whole of the bad portion will, quite likely, be soon removed without the action of the Board. And, besides, the petitioners have not shown that the pavement is a nuisance till several weeks after it is laid down. 2. The only thoroughly effectual remedy against the continued spread of the nuisance in question upon other streets, if it shall not be voluntarily discontinued, would seem to be an injunction from the Courts in a suit by this Board, but there is reason to believe that pending legislation may relieve this Board of its duties, at least in regard to nuisances, before a litigation in the Courts could reach any very useful result. And in that event it is to be presumed that the petitioners will find in the new legislation some better and surer means of redress, if the nuisance shall not, in the meantime, have been removed by the process just referred to.

The Crawford Bribery Case—Examination of Crawford.

United States Commissioner WHITE sat yesterday for the purpose of ascertaining the merits of a charge recently made against a resident of the Eighth Ward named SAMUEL L. FERN of having offered a bribe of $50 to Policeman JOHN H. CRAWFORD, of the Sixteenth Precinct, to secure his non-attendance in the alleged Dimond counterfeiting case. A Government witness, CRAWFORD testified that he made an affidavit against DIMOND and that he was subsequently met by FERN, and that the latter offered him $50 if he would promise not to appear in the case. On the cross-examination he declined to state whether he had accepted the money on the ground that it might criminate him before the Police Board. The examination was then adjourned until next Saturday.

THE HAYES MURDER.

Judge Gilbert's Decision in the Perry Case—The Prisoner Held to Bail in $20,000—He is Yet in Jail.

Judge GILBERT yesterday rendered his decision in the question of admitting EDWIN PERRY to bail. It is as follows:

This is an application on behalf of the prisoner, to admit him to bail. He is under indictment for murder in the first degree; he has been twice tried, and on both occasions the jury were unable to agree upon a verdict. His counsel now claim that these disagreements of the jury create such a doubt of the prisoner's guilt as enables him to be bailed. The power of the Supreme Court or of a Justice thereof to bail in all cases, whether it be treason, murder, arson or any other offence, is indisputable. (Ex-parte Taylor, 5 Com. 29; People vs. Godwin, 5 C. H. R.; People vs. Van Horne, 8; Burb., 162, fd vs. Baker, 10 Howard R., 567.) This power to bail may be exercised either before or after indictment. Whether the power shall be exercised or not rests in the discretion of the Court. This discretion is not an arbitrary, but a judicial one, and is governed by established principles and precedents. Generally speaking, bail will be refused after indictment, in any case where punishment is death or a degrading imprisonment, because the indictment makes a strong presumption of guilt, and experience teaches that in such cases the prisoner will attempt to elude the demands of justice. But where it stands indifferent whether the prisoner be guilty or innocent, bail ought in most cases be allowed. In the case of The People vs. Brown, this subject was thoroughly discussed by that great and learned and upright Judge, the late C. J. SPENCER, and his decision has never been questioned, but has been repeatedly sanctioned by the Courts of this and other States. (Cases supra; People vs. Linder, 19 Cal., 539.) He says "there is no certain or fixed rule in cases of felony, each particular case depending on its peculiar circumstances. The objection and end of imprisonment before trial is to secure the forthcoming of a person charged with the commission of a crime, and it is never intended as any part of the punishment, for until the guilt of the party is legally ascertained, there is no ground of punishment, and it would be cruel and unjust to inflict it. The law of every free Government estimates personal liberty as of the most sacred character, and it ought not to be violated or abridged before trial but in cases where there are strong presumptions of guilt." This case occurred fifty years ago. The prisoner was committed upon a Coroner's inquisition for murder. On the trial the jury rendered a verdict of guilty. On motion of his counsel, the jurors were polled, when the third one called expressed his dissent from this verdict. They were again sent out, but were finally discharged, unable to agree. In granting the motion to be admitted to bail, Chief Justice SPENCER further observes: "It appears to me from the facts before me, the conclusion is inevitable that it is quite doubtful whether the prisoner is guilty, and I think it stands indifferent whether he is so or not. I must presume that the jurors are impartial, and that their final disagreement proceeded from a conscientious difference in opinion as to the prisoner's guilt, and I am therefore bound to conclude that the prisoner may be innocent of the offence. In such a case, as I understand the law, he is entitled to be bailed." As I before remarked, this case has never been questioned, but, on the contrary, stands on the strength of its reasoning and upon the sanction afforded by its frequent approval since as the law of the land. In the case of TAYLOR, supra, the prisoner was approved unqualifically, and Mr. Judge WOODWORTH said: "Undoubtedly the true rule of law is here laid down by the Chief Justice, and it is expressed with his usual precision and perspicuity." Since this decision was made the code of criminal procedure of Criminal Code has been going on, and now in most of the States of the Union the right to bail even in capital cases, unless the proof is evident or the presumption great, is secured by express constitutional provisions. In our own State this right has not been embodied in the fundamental law, but has still been intrusted to the highest Court of original jurisdiction of the members there thereof. The duty of affording protection in proper cases, however, is imperative, and, in determining whether the particular case is proper or not, we may well adopt the constitutional principle of our sister States, in favor of liberty, and allow bail unless the proof is evident and the presumption great. In the case before us the District-Attorney, in a vehement tirade, insisted that, notwithstanding two juries have been unable to agree upon a verdict, the guilt of the prisoner is clear, and that the jury could not have failed to agree in either instance if the Court had not erroneously excluded evidence of the dying declaration of the deceased, and instructed the jury upon the evidence of the case, and misled them in reviewing the evidence, when the case was submitted to them. With respect to the exclusion of the dying declaration, I am of the opinion that the ruling of the Judge (PRATT) was clearly correct. The general rule is that all testimony is inadmissible which has not the sanction of a judicial oath. In the case of a declaration made by a person under the apprehension of impending dissolution, is an exception to the rule. The principle upon which this exception is taken is very clear and obvious. It is presumed that a person knowing that his decease is at hand, and consciously knowing that he stands on the verge of eternity and that he is to be called to an immediate account for all that he has done amiss, before a Judge "from whom no secrets are hid," will feel as strong a motive to declare the truth and to abstain from deception as any person who acts under the obligation of an oath. So jealous is the law of any deviation from the general rule, that it confines the exception to the necessity of the case, and only renders such declarations admissible when they relate to the cause of death, and are tendered on a criminal charge respecting it, now then unless the Court be first satisfied that the party at the time of declaration was under the impression of approaching death, and was without hope of recovery. (Stark on Evidence, 2d. 58. 1st Phillips on Evidence, Edward's Edition, 285, 299.)

After recapitulating it, the Judge resumed as follows:

It needs no observation to show that this was wholly insufficient. It would have been easy for the public prosecutor to have given medical testimony as to what would be necessarily been the mental consciousness on this subject of a person in the condition of the deceased, or other more direct evidence of the actual state of his mind on this point at the time the declarations were made, and it seems that he made no effort to do so, as the testimony of the declarations would have been of vital importance. I have carefully perused the charge of the Judge and find in it no erroneous statement of the law. On the contrary, the legal propositions in the case were presented to the jury with remarkable accuracy, precision and perspicuity. The public prosecutor complains that the Judge refused to charge that murder was a conclusive presumption from the fact of killing, and that the burden was on the prisoner to the law, "Express malice," which is another form of stating the idea of "premeditated design," under our statute always has to be proved. There are cases where such "premeditated design" may be inferred from the killing alone; still, in such cases, the circumstances attending the homicide must be unequivocal, admitting of only one conclusion. This rule manifestly has no application to the case. The jurors, however, say the act done. The prisoner gave evidence to prove that even if he fired the shot he was not in a condition to know what he did. And the prosecution proved his declaration that he had fired at, and that he had fired back. This evidence may have been wholly unsatisfactory or incredible, but it was the duty of the Court to submit it to the jury, and it was their province exclusively to determine its effect. The case of YATES (27 N. Y. R., 516) is a signal illustration of the true rule, and shows that if the rule contended for by the public prosecutor had been adopted, a conviction would have been reached and would have been set aside. In that case YATES shot a Police officer. The circumstances were unequivocal, but whether it was murder or not depended on the fact whether he knew the person he killed was an officer, and it was held to be incumbent on the public prosecutor to satisfy the jury of this fact upon the evidence. I have not time to discuss the law upon this subject at length. Suffice it to say, that the existence of "premeditated design" is always a fact to be proved. With respect to the manner of presenting the facts by the presiding Justice and his comments thereon to the jury, that is a subject with which I have nothing to do. It is not suggested that he misstated the evidence. He had a right to present his own views of its effect, but after all it was the province of the jury to determine all questions of fact, and no error in the instructions. I have not the liberty to express any opinion as to the conclusion to which the evidence in the case tends. For manifest reasons it would be highly improper for me to do so. The prisoner's counsel urged with great earnestness that it is wholly insufficient to implicate his client. The District Attorney, on the other hand insists that the prisoner's guilt was established beyond a doubt. Upon the latter hypothesis, it is difficult to perceive why the District Attorney gave in evidence the prisoner's evidence after the homicide, that "he had been fired at and fired back." This manifestly created great embarrassment in determining the case. It is, no doubt, to be deplored that the case has not been determined, but in seeking for the cause of the failure it is wrong to attribute it to the partiality of the Court, or to any fault on the part of the jury. Some importance should be given to the omission of getting in the dying declaration, and something to the colloquy after the charge which in the case of the prosecution of the prisoner's declaration made after the homicide. In doing this, however, it is not necessary to impute incompetency or imbecility to the District-Attorney even though it should be deemed that the blunders referred to may have aided in producing the result of the trial. In regard to the statement contained in the affidavit of S. D. MORRIS, relative to what occurred between the presiding Justice and himself, immediately after the first trial, I forbear to comment. This statement may fitly be reserved for investigation elsewhere. The affidavits may be filed, and as I deem the case one in which it would be a discreet and sound exercise of the power to bail, the prisoner will be let to bail himself accordingly, in $20,000, with four sureties of competent ability in $5,000 for his appearance at the next Court of Oyer and Terminer to be held in this county.

A Sullivan County Lawyer Accused of Retaining Pension Money—No Foundation for the Charge.

A perfectly groundless charge was made on the part of a farmer, named ROBERT S. HALL, residing at White Plains, in the United States Commissioner's Office, yesterday, against a lawyer, named BENJAMIN LOW, of Monticello, Sullivan County, the brother of Hon. HENRY A. LOW. He was accused of retaining a portion of the pension money awarded to the complainant for wounds received while serving in the One Hundred and Fifty-sixth New-York Volunteer Regiment. The testimony did not bear out the charge, and the defendant was honorably discharged.

Lecture by Professor Draper.

The fifth of the series of lectures given under the auspices of "Post Phil. Kearney," No. 8, Grand Army of the Republic, for the benefit of the fund for the relief of disabled soldiers and sailors, was delivered at Irving Hall, last evening, by Professor J. W. DRAPER. He gave an account of numerous incidents connected with the late war, and described some of the great battles. Professor R. OGDEN DOREMUS will deliver the last lecture of the course on next Saturday evening, his subject being "Explosive Materials." The Board of Fire Commissioners have determined to have the engineers connected with their department hear the lecture, and have purchased tickets in advance for that purpose.

A Father Stabbed by his Son.

MICHAEL KALLANHAN, aged 62, of No. 605 East Fourteenth-street, fell in the street yesterday and fractured a leg. He was removed to Bellevue Hospital.

JOHN CARMAN, aged 57, of Baldwinsville, L. I., was severely injured yesterday at the Fulton Fish Market, by a heavy box falling on his head. He was taken to Bellevue Hospital.

At an early hour yesterday morning PATRICK GAFFNEY, proprietor of the liquor store corner of Avenue B and Fifteenth-street, was knocked down in his store by three unknown men, who rendered him insensible, and then robbed him of a gold watch and $350 in money. Mr. GAFFNEY cannot give any description of the robbers.

BENJAMIN B. MALLORY and MICHAEL MCFARLAND, both residing at No. 43 Oliver-street, quarreled last evening about some trivial matter, when MALLORY became so enraged that he drew a knife and stabbed MCFARLAND four times, once on the head, twice in the breast and once in the abdomen. All of the wounds were pronounced to be of a dangerous character by Dr. FRAZER, who was summoned by the Police. MALLORY was arrested and locked up in the Fourth Ward Police Station, and his victim removed to Bellevue Hospital in an ambulance.

The Board of Assessors met yesterday and confirmed the assessments for opening the following streets: Fifth, from Fourth-avenue to Prospect Park; Sixth, from Third to Fourth avenue; Twenty-fourth, from Fifth to Sixth avenue; Beaver, from Flushing to Bushwick avenue. The assessments for the gradings and paving of the following streets were also confirmed: Dean, from Classon to Franklin-avenue; Eckford, between Norman and Van Cott avenues; Frost, between Smith-street and Kingsland-avenue; Kosciusko, between Tompkins and Throop avenues; Marcy-avenue, between Lafayette-avenue and Madison-street; North Tenth-street, between Third-street and the East River; North Eleventh, between Third-street and the Bulkhead; Myrtle, between Bushwick and Central avenues; Oakland, between Eagle and Freeman streets; Skillman, between Graham-avenue and Smith-street; Throop-avenue, from Myrtle to Flushing avenue; Flagging Wyckoff-street, both sides, between Fifth and Sixth avenues; Skillman-street, paving and grading between Lorimer and Leonard.

The recent controversy between Surgeon JACKSON, of the Brooklyn Naval Hospital, and Lieutenant-Commander MITCHELL, concerning the alleged refusal of the former to admit the latter to his hospital as a patient, to be treated by a surgeon in civil life, is to become a subject of official investigation, and a Court of Inquiry has been instituted, to meet at the Navy-yard next Tuesday, Feb. 15, to ascertain the facts and report them to Washington. The Court will consist of Rear-Admiral SYLVANUS W. GODON, Commander WM. D. WHITING, and Surgeon JOSEPH BEALE.

An explosion took place at the chemical works of PFIZER & Co., corner of Harrison-avenue and Bartlett-street, yesterday morning, by which two men were badly burned and the premises damaged to the extent of about $1,000. MICHAEL BROWN and MICHAEL CONRAD were mixing some acids, and made a mistake; hence the explosion.

A fire took place in the building occupied by Captain STRONG, in the Navy Yard, on Friday, owing to a defect in the heater. The flames were soon extinguished, and the damage amounted to about $1,200.

In the will of MICHAEL DUNNE appears the following charitable bequests: To the House of the Good Shepherd, Brooklyn, and to the Sisters of the Poor of St. Francis, of St. Peter's Hospital, and to the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum, Brooklyn, the premises known as Nos. 25 and 26 Amity-street, and the rear house upon the same.

It is necessary for persons not known to the illicit distillers of the Fifth Ward to be registered, or their lives are in danger in passing through the ward. A citizen of the ward was almost pounded to death on Friday, because they suspected him of being a spy.

SYLVANUS BARTIS, a sailor, presented a worthless check to a Tillary-street tailor yesterday in payment for a $63 suit of clothes. He was arrested and held to answer.

LONG ISLAND.

The corporation formed under the acts of the Legislature for draining marsh lands on Staten and Long Islands, advertises that it will apply to the Supreme Court, which meets at Brooklyn on the 21st inst., for the appointment of Commissioners to make contracts for reclaiming these lands on Long Island, and to assess the damage or benefit arising to owners. This corporation is empowered to issue stock without limit in payment for lands or material, beyond its capital stock, which is limited to $1,000,000, and to borrow money on its own bonds, secured by mortgage on the bonds and its franchise, and the Commissioners will have power to take property from its owners, improve it, and assess the benefit, and to sell the land if the assessments are not paid. This is complained of as tyrannical by some Long Islanders.

A rather interesting horse case was heard in the Justice's Court at Astoria during the past week. It seems that about two years since a farmer in the neighborhood had a horse stolen, of which no clue could be obtained, although efforts were made for his recovery. Recently the lost horse's owner was much impressed with the idea that the animal driven by one of the most respectable physicians of the place was no other than the identical beast which had been stolen from him. Inquiries were at once made, and resulted in the discovery that the doctor had purchased the horse at about the time of the disappearance of the animal, and had driven him constantly since that time. The quondam owner of the horse at once claimed him, proved ownership and took possession. The curious part of the affair is that the owner should not have recognized the horse before, as he lived not a half mile distant from the doctor.
